THE SEXTARY.

A heavy hand the bruised neck to break.
A foot to quench the smoking flax well shod.
A bitter zeal, short and keen to make
The breach more wide betwixt mankind and God.
A visage stern that bids all stand apart
Who dare to worship at a different shrine,
A silent mood, a cold and sluggish heart,
Unwarmed by any pulse of love divine.
A tongue in chiding swift, in praying slow,
As practiced were his fellows' faults to see—
These are the attributes by which men know
The sextary, unloved by God or man.
—London Spectator.

THE QUIET MAN.

When I was quite a young fellow and hadn't long joined the army, I used to belong to a fashionable club in London, the members of which were just the sort of men you read about in Lever's novels—as wild as wild could be, always in some scrape or other, and spending their whole time in riding, shooting, gambling or fighting—all except one.
That one was a small, quiet, pale faced, gray haired man, with a very sad, weary look, as if he had once been crushed by some great sorrow and had never been able to shake it off. He hardly ever spoke to any one, and when he did it was in a voice as meek as his face. So of course we made great fun of him among ourselves, finding these quiet ways of his a very queer contrast to our own rascally, harum scarum style, and we nicknamed him the "Quietest Man in the Club," though, indeed, we might just as well have called him the only quiet man in it.
One evening when the room was pretty full, our friend the quiet man was sitting as usual in the far corner away from everybody else, we began to talk about dueling, a subject which was very familiar to all of us, and being well informed, you will not wonder why I should have said:

ing, there he was, though he looked—as it seemed to me—rather paler and feebler than usual.
"Here's now for you, Fred," called out Charlie Thornton. "That muscally French duelist, De Villeneuve, has met his match at last, and Dr. Lansett of the—th Bengal Native Infantry, who saw the whole affair, is just going—call us all about it."
"Well, this was how it happened," began the doctor. "In passing through Paris I stopped to visit my old friend, Colonel de Malet, and he and I were strolling through the Tuileries gardens when suddenly a nutcracker ran through the crowd, 'Here comes De Villeneuve.' Then the throng parted, and I had just time to catch a glimpse of the bully's tall figure and long black mustache when a man stepped forth from the crowd and said something to him, and then suddenly dealt him a blow.
"Then there was a rush and clamor of voices, and everybody came crowding round so that I couldn't see anything. But presently De Malet came up to me and said, 'Lansett, we shall wait you in this affair, although I'm afraid that you won't have a chance of showing your surgery, for De Villeneuve never wounds without killing. But when the crowd opened, and I saw to my amazement that this man who had insulted and dealt the most terrible fighter in all France was a slim little fellow, with a pale, meager face."
"As the challenged party, I have the choice of weapons," we heard him say quite coolly, "and I choose swords."
"Are you mad?" cried De Malet, stilling his arm. "Do you know De Villeneuve's deadliest weapon? It is a European. Choose pistols—give yourself a chance!"
"Pistols may miss—swords can't," answered the stranger in a tone of such savage determination that every one who heard him, even De Villeneuve himself, shuddered. "I had vowed never to fight again, save with a man who deserved to die. But you have insured it well by your cold blooded murders, and die you shall!"
"Where both sides were so eager to fight there was no need of much preparation. They met that evening, Colonel de Malet being the stranger's second, and another French officer acting for De Villeneuve.
"They fought for some time without a scratch on either side, and then suddenly the Englishman scrambled forward, exposing his left side. Quick as lightning the Frenchman's point darted in, and instantly the other's shirt was all crimson with blood, but the moment he felt the steel pierce him he made a thrust with all his strength and buried his sword up to the hilt in De Villeneuve's body. Then I understood that he had deliberately laid himself open to his opponent's weapon in order to make sure of killing him. So he had, for De Villeneuve never spoke again."
Just as the doctor said this, down fell a chair with a great crash, and looking up we saw the quiet man trying to slip past to the door. Dr. Lansett sprang up and caught him by both hands.
"You here?" he cried. "Let me congratulate you upon having punished, as he deserved, the most cold hearted cut-throat in existence. I trust your wound does not pain you, and that you will be able to get on your feet again."
"What?" we all shouted, "was it he who killed De Villeneuve?"
"Indeed it was," answered the doctor, "and it was the luckiest thing I ever saw."
We all jumped up from our chairs and came crowding round the hero, setting up a cheer that made the air ring, but he looked at us so sadly and darkly that it made the shout die upon our lips.
"Ah, let me tell you," said he in a tone of deep dejection, "for heaven's sake don't praise a man for having shed blood and destroyed life. I killed that ruffian as I would have killed a wild beast to save those who were about to be slaughtered. But God help the man who shall take a human life merely to gratify his own pride and anger! If you wish to know what happiness a successful duelist enjoys, look at me. Do you remember that story which Charlie Thornton told you the other night about the duel in which Colonel Fortescue—the 'famous duelist,' as you call him—killed Sir Henry Martingale?"
"To be sure," answered Charlie Thornton, looking rather scared. "But what of it?"
"I was once Colonel Fortescue," was the answer.—Exchange.

Pains in the Joints

Caused by Inflammatory Swelling

A Perfect Cure by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"It affords me much pleasure to recommend Hood's Sarsaparilla. My son was afflicted with great pain in the joints, accompanied with swelling so bad that he could not get up stairs to bed without crawling on hands and knees. I was very anxious about him, and having read so much about Hood's Sarsaparilla, I determined to try it, and get a half-dozen bottles, four of which entirely cured him." Mrs. G. A. Lutz, Oshawa, Ontario.
