MARY HAWORTH Girl Spurns Marriage; Prefers Travel, a Solo

Dear Mary Haworth: What about a girl who doesn't want to marry? That is my problem. Maybe because of the many unhappy marriages I have noted among my friends and colleagues.

I am 23, fairly attractive and otherwise normal. I think I have been in love a few times (before now) but when things start to build towards marriage, I cool off and find a way out.

In my heart I see nothing wrong with the attitude, though some of my friends disagree, and in later life I may want to "bother" to marry as I don't relish the prospect of growing old alone.

"Meanwhile I want to live it up! travel (as I do in my work), study and be free to go my way without strings attached or children to care for."

At the moment I am deeply in love with a married man, 43, who stays with his wife in an unhappy life because of their habits or pasting over. We are dating three months ago. I used to see him around a social club, but he is currently a doctor indifferent to women, drinking a lot too much.

My life has changed completely, has real zest for life, loves music, dancing, art, is very generous and I have been having a wonderful time, anything but clandestine, which may have been indiscreet, as his wife has found out.

Each of them is fearful of a full discussion. However, so things haven't come to a head as yet. But if and when they do, I will face up to the triangle and the fact that he loves me (as he pleases to tell her), she probably will vote to let the triangle together, in a "name only" marriage, for the children's sake.

I am convinced this is the only solution. It is better for the children to have some real love, better for me, as I don't want to have a permanent relationship with a man who is not devoted to me, as she can devote herself fully to the children and not "bother" with sex, which doesn't interest her anyway.

What do you think? R.F. Dear R.F.: In your long letter, we commended you ask if your cake-eater attitude is to be commended. Or if you are just rationalizing, trying to put the best face on frustration?

I suppose the truth is that you are so mixed-up, due to a bit-or-miss pattern of life to date; also so divorced, as if weary from the essential nature of your deepest feelings, tightly locked in your unconscious mind, that you have no real emotional contact with anybody. Instead of experiencing a vital, meaningful interchange of happiness, devotion and solicitude with a beloved person, you are engaged in shadow play - somewhat as a child plays house with dolls - in your successive love relationships, so-called.

You are putting on an act of personal involvement with the partner, from the first romantic overture until the curtain falls or you check out. You are the center and circumference of the drama as it affects you. The others in their turn are simply dummies of sorts, cast in supporting roles in your personal self-absorption.

Perhaps it is only when these puppets threaten to come alive, and to speak their own lines, it were that you begin to cool off and quit the game for that particular episode?

As to the present triangle, it seems probable that you individually mean as little to the man as he means to you, fundamentally. Likely he senses instinctively your incapacity for significant enduring devotion, in your gifts or pasting over.

Thus he ventures to love you, who was disposed to invest doubt heartedly, with integrity, and yourself to do so the same.

My advice is: get yourself straightened out with psychology before you meet any man, who you may learn to love with total commitment, responsibly.

Leaders' Wives Arrange Move

OTTAWA (CP)—Mrs. Lester B. Pearson said Friday she and her prime minister-elect husband will move next Friday into 24 Sussex Street, the official residence here of Canada's prime ministers.

Mrs. Pearson and Mrs. John Diefenbaker had a telephone call to arrange for the exchange of their residences. The Diefenbakers will move into 24 Sussex, a residence in suburban Rockcliffe Park village provided by a bi-partisan group of prominent Canadian citizens for leaders of the official opposition.

Liberal Leader Pearson will be sworn in Monday, Canada's new prime minister. Mr. Diefenbaker then will revert to the role of opposition leader held for about six months in 1956-57.

After Mr. Pearson and Mr. Diefenbaker held their first post-election meeting Monday, the Liberal leader, asked by reporters when they would switch residences, said "our wives will decide that."

Former Liberal prime minister Louis St. Laurent was the first prime minister to occupy 24 Sussex Street, overlooking the Ottawa River, about two miles from Parliament Hill and across the street from the residence of the Governor-General, Stornaway, a about a quarter mile distant, has been occupied by four opposition leaders—George Drew, now Canadian high commissioner in London, and Mr. Pearson.

After being elected Conservative party leader in December, 1956, Mr. Pearson, then opposition leader, Mr. Diefenbaker declined to move into Stornaway, confidently predicting he would soon be moving into 24 Sussex Street. He did the following June.

COST $500,000. The three-story home for Canadian prime ministers, located on four acres of land, was completed in 1951 at a cost of some $900,000.

The grey stone residence to be erected and maintained by government employees but the prime minister pays the government $5,000 annually for lodging and food for himself and family.

The prime minister also is provided with a 134-acre country home on three-mile-long Harrington Lake, about 19 miles north of Ottawa in the Prince Albert area of Quebec. The two-story, seven-bedroom lodge was built in 1925 at a cost of about $100,000.

Stornaway, a 14-room grey stone mansion, was purchased in 1850 for about $75,000 as a permanent residence for the leader of the opposition.

STARE CASINO STOCK TORONTO (CP)—Two Toronto firms will be major shareholders in Grand Bahama Island Development, a new casino project. ### ELLEN'S DIARY

Farm Children Said To Learn Naturally

"Where are they - your kittens?" we inquired - "You know, when she came home this morning at our door. She looked up, expression mysterious and turned to the bowl of breakfast we offered.

"They're here - the kittens," Alex said later. "We're sure of that. But where are they? That is the question. I've looked everywhere. And listened, but there's not a sound of them."

"It's likely they are in a hay-loft. He shook his head. "If they were, someone would have found them by this, he said - "Would you say," he questioned another thought, "this would be too early to let a bantam hatch?"

"It's pretty early," we said. "I just wondered. There's one on a nest."

"Does she cluck?" "Does she?" "Chucked." "She's the cluckiest bantam I ever knew."

"Then she will likely have her own way about it. What does your grandfather say?" Alex smiled. "You know how he always says he doesn't like bantams - that they're always in the way in the stables? When I showed him where she was on the nest, he said, 'Let her stay. She won't do any harm there - poor little thing. She's not much bigger than a robin, is she?' That's what he said."

"Children of the farm have an advantage over their city-cousins," an instructor from a far city remarked to the other summer. "They have the Old Book of Knowledge before them all the time. They actually don't have to learn by textbook or lecture, or film, many of the things you grow up knowing. So getting material on this holiday."

And he went with James up the rise of farm-hill to take a picture of a heifer, loving her new-born calf there.

"We should," our men-folks agreed this morning, "get those boxes-stalls cleaned this once day. We'll be needing that spare one to house this or that, when the farrowing commences."

be located this way? And talked of the spring-cleaning ahead.

We house-cleaned an old chest of drawers, and found some to delay us - even a newspaper lining a drawer was a find in its age! - the sun westerling warned us of the day's decline, before our chore was complete.

"Come and see what you think of my purchase," Mack invited, coming by after school. "And Granddaughter" she looked up from the textbook she studied here in the quiet this evening. Her smile bespoke young dream.

"They have lovely things in the store-windows now; pretty dresses and hats - I saw the loveliest -!"

"You have dresses and hats?" James commented. "But, Grandfather, they're old-fashioned things now, actually quaint!"

"I'll bet they're not too 'quaint' as you call it. There's a lot of wear in them yet!" "Oh, Granddaddy!" she sighed. "So each to his own, the sea-glass brings its interests to this family. Varied, yes. And some wish upon a star, and dream their young dreams."

Until tomorrow... - Diary-Good-night....
