Trip From Downing Street To Palace At Times Lonely One

By EDDY GILMORE

LONDON (AP) — Sir Anthony Eden took one of the loneliest journeys of his life Wednesday night—that mile-long strip of asphalt road between 10 Downing Street and Buckingham Palace.

Illuminated by gas street lamps from the Victorian era, this lonesome stretch of road in the heart of a huge city bears the odd name of Birdcage Walk.

Eden made the trip slumped in the back seat of a government automobile, a shiny silk hat resting shakily on his knees.

Only a handful of people, most of whom were unaware that Eden was resigning as prime minister, gathered at each end of his journey.

Eden's last ride as prime minister began at a few minutes past 6 o'clock.

A knot of photographers, reporters and bobbies stood in front of the old oak door at No. 10, two more gas lights casting long slanting shadows in the night.

Suddenly the door opened—and out came Eden.

He raised a limp hand and stepped into his car. He put his hat on his knees and, looking like a man holding back tears, spoke a soft order to his chauffeur

ONLY SILENCE

Off they went. There were no shouts, no cries only the silence of about 50 people.

The prime minister's car swung slowly past the cenotaph, that granite monument to the war dead. Simon, one of Eden's two sons, was killed in the Second World War.

Up past the cenotaph Eden's automobile moved past the foreign office, scene of Eden's greatest triumphs.

Then it started down Birdcage Walk, a long, straight road, each side lined by gaunt, sentinel-like trees, their limbs leafless in the January night.

Halfway down the road Eden's car passed the ruins of the Guards' Chapel, all but destroyed by a flying bomb that killed scores of worshippers in the last days of the war.

SOON OVER

No more than 25 people stood at the east gate of Buckingham Palace as Eden went in. Again there was silence. Soon it was all over. Eden had seen the Queen.

At one minute past 7 o'clock Eden's car rumbled out of the travel courtyard of the palace. A sentry presented arms at the west gate.

Eden, his silk hat still on his knees, smiled faintly as his car turned up Constitution Hill and the road to Chequers, the country home of prime ministers.

The chauffeur stepped on the gas. Eden's car zoomed past the few drivers who had enough gasoline coupons to be on the road. A few moments more and the automobile was rolling toward the shadows of the countryside.

Back at 10 Downing Street the small crowd had swelled outside the doors of the prime minister's town residence. Inside the grimy old house was one of the men—or so it was thought—who would become Britain's next prime minister.

By this time the clock showed 7:15.

The door opened at 11 Downing street, residence of the chancellor of the exchequer, Harold Macmillan, one of the men mentioned as the successor to Eden.

LATE FOR DINNER?

Out popped the hatless head of Lady Dorothy Macmillan, wife of the chancellor. She has a title as the daughter of the ninth Duke of Devonshire.

Then followed one of those homey moments that leavers the making of drama.

"Where is he?" asked Macmillan's wife of a chauffeur standing on the sidewalk.

"Inside, me lady," said the driver nodding at No. 10.

"Well," said Lady Dorothy, "if he doesn't look out he's going to be late for dinner."

But what of R. A. Butler, lord privy seal, and heavily tipped to succeed Eden.

"Aw," said a bobbie, "'e's gone home. Nipped out the back door, 'e did."

SIR ANTHONY IS MAN OF MANY EXPRESSIONS

Sir Anthony Eden, British Prime Minister who resigned yesterday is an expressive speaker. Here the camera records some of his many facial expressions as he addressed a combined session of the Canadian Senate and Commons during a visit to this Country last winter. He frequently removed his glasses(as in the third picture) and, when his speech was finished, forgot them when he left the Commons. A Commons page later delivered them to him at a reception.
