AN ARKANSAS PROPHET.

A New Year's Story. BY RUTH M'ENEY STUART.

(Now First Published—All Rights Reserved.)

If you would find the warmest spot in a little village, on a cold day, watch the old codgers and see where they congregate. That's what the straggle cats, or perhaps the codgers watch the cats. However that may be, it is safe to follow either, for both may be depended upon to find the open door where comfort is. They would probably lead you to the rear end of the village store, the tobacco-stained drawing room where an old stove dispenses hospitality in an atmosphere like unto which, for general disposition, there is none on earth so unfailing.

From November to May the old stove in the back of Chris' Rowton's store was, to devotees at least, the most popular hostess in Simpkinsville. And, be it understood, her circle was composed of people in good repute. Even the cats sleeping at her feet, if personally tramped were well contented. Long lineal descendants of known cats belonging to families in good standing. Many, indeed, were natives of the shop, and had come into this kingdom of comfort in a certain feline lying in hospital, behind the rows of barrels that flanked the store on either side.

It was the last day of December. The wind was raw, and cold, and of a fitful mind, blowing in contrary gusts and throwing into the faces of the people going in all directions various stories from the winter storehouse of the sky, now a threat, a promise or a dare, and to how the New Year should come in.

"How's Meredith's wife coming on, doctor? Reckon she's pretty bad off, ain't she?"

"The doctor was filling his pipe now, and he did not answer immediately. But presently he said, as he deliberately reached forward and seized the tongs and lifted a live coal to his pipe:

"Meredith's wife don't rightly belong in a doctor's care. She ain't to say sick."

"But I do know her pate," said THE PARSON.

"She's heartbroken, that's what she is, but of course that ain't a thing I can tell her or him, either."

"That's a mighty slow and tiresome way in Simpkinsville," he added, in a moment, "an' I'm glad to see it draw in to a close. It come in with snow an' sleet an' troubles, an' seems like it's goin' out the same way—jest like the years have done three years past."

"Jest look at that cat, what a dust color she's got between spots. Thain's a cat in Simpkinsville, hardly, that don't show a trace of Jim Meredith's malice—an' I jest natchly despise it," came that one of the presents he brought out there—that malice cat.

"Malice is a good enough color for a cat if it's kept true, remarked old Pete Taylor. "Plenty good enough of it's kept true, but it's like gray paint; it'll mark up most anything it's mixed with, and cloud it."

"I reckon Jim Meredith's malice ain't the only thing of his that's cast a shade over Simpkinsville," said old Mr. McMonigle, who sat opposite.

"That's so," grunted the clerk.

"That's so—there you're born out," echoed Pete. "Simpkinsville has turned out some of the best fellows since the day that Meredith dropped out of it, but the sun ain't never shone on it quite the same—to my notion."

"Wonder where she is?" said McMonigle. "My opinion is she's dead, an' that her mother knows it. I wouldn't be surprised if the devil that enticed her away has killed her. One's a fellow like that gets a girl into a crowded city and gets tired of her there's a dozen ways of gittin' shot of her."

"Yes, a hundred of 'em. It's done every day, I don't doubt."

"See that stove how she spits smoke, east wind'll make her spit any day—seems to gag her."

"Yes," said McMonigle, chuckling softly as he leaned forward and began poking the fire, "she hates a east wind, but she likes me. Don't you, old girl? See her grow red in the face while she chuck her under the chin."

"Look out you don't chuck out a coal of fire on kitty with your footin'," said old man Taylor, and then he added:

How Scott's Sarsaparilla Compares With its Rivals.

Far Ahead in Quality, Purity and Strength—As a Spring Medicine it is Unsurpassed.

An excellent idea of the purity, palatableness, strength, cost and effect of Scott's Sarsaparilla as compared with the rival blood-purifiers and spring medicines is as follows:

Rival Canadian brands. Rival American brands. Rival European brands. Scott's Sarsaparilla the best.

"She does out in the face, don't she? An' see her wink under her bushy spectacles when she's flirted with."

"That stove is a well-behaved old lady, regularly gets religion, an' shouts whenever the wind's from the right quarter—an' I won't have her spoke of with disrespect," said the doctor.

"If she could tell all she's heard, sittin' there summer an' winter, I reckon it'd make a book—an' an' interesting one, too. There's a cat born in her all summer an' birds' chatter. Rowton tells me he's got a dominicker hen that's regularly watched for the fire to go out last two seasons, she cackles when she didn't never hear about Phil Toland hidin' a whisky bottle in her one day last summer and smashin' a whole sittin' of eggs."

"The hen she squawked out at him an' all but led him to death. He thought he'd got the tremens, shore—an' an' a adult variety."

"Pity it hadn't a shagger him into temperance, remarked the man opposite.

"Did sober him up for purty nigh two weeks. Rowton he saw it all, an' he give the feller the wink, and when he'd hollered he ast him what was the matter, an' of co'se Pete he pointed to the hen that was kintin' through the stove that minute, squawkin' for dear life, an' all bechubbled over with eggs, an' she had sort of dash blanketed hen hev you got round here, settin' in stoves!"

"An' Rowton he looks round and winks at the boys. 'Hen,' sez he, 'ast her hen? Any of you fellers seen a hen anywhere round here?'"

"Of co'se every feller s'wo'e he hadn't saw no hen, an' Rowton he went up last two weeks an' he ast her, 'Pete, better go home and lay down. You ain't well.'"

"Well, sir, Pete wasn't seen on the streets for up'ards of three weeks after that. 'Yes, that stove has seen sights and heard secrets, too, I don't doubt."

"They say that nigger, Prophet, used to set down and talk to her same as she was a person, some nights, when he'd have her all to hisself. Rowton ast him one day what made him do it, and he loved that he could converse with anything that had the breath of life in it."

"Reckon I got both froze and wet drops on me twixt this an' Meredith's," drawled the newcomer, depositing his saddle-bags beside his chair, wiping the drops from his sleeves over the stove, and spreading his thin palms for its grateful return of warm steam.

"Clear 'out our way," remarked his neighbor, between pipe puffs. And then he added:

"How's Meredith's wife coming on, doctor? Reckon she's pretty bad off, ain't she?"

"The doctor was filling his pipe now, and he did not answer immediately. But presently he said, as he deliberately reached forward and seized the tongs and lifted a live coal to his pipe:

BLOOD AND MASSACRE.

Cilicia The Scene of Turkish and Kurdish Atrocities.

LYNN, Mass., April 3.—The first news of continued massacres of Christians in Armenia, by Turks and Kurds, in several weeks was received in this city today by a member of the Armenian colony. The letter was from a relative in a district of Cilicia, near the Euphrates river, Asia Minor, and was sent by one of the American missionaries in the district, in his own letter to a correspondent in Philadelphia, with instructions to forward it to Lynn. This precaution was taken to insure its being sent to this country. It was written the last week in February and gave accounts of awful massacres in the district up to that time. In the village where the writer resided, several hundred Christians were killed in the early part of winter and all the young women and maidens carried off by the Kurds. Some families who escaped to the mountains after the massacres were offered protection by the Turkish Government if they would return to their homes. Some put faith in the Sultan's representatives, but as soon as they were seen in the village they were set upon and butchered in the most brutal manner.

In a small village named Tali, a wedding party was attacked while coming out of the Gregorian church. All the men of the party were assassinated and stripped of their clothing, after which the bodies were cut into pieces before the eyes of the unfortunate women, who were afterwards carried off into captivity.

One Turkish sheik or chief gave orders to his followers to kill all the Christians and spare none, for there would be no peace in the country until the entire race of Armenians was removed by the sword. In some places the Armenians were armed and offered resistance. It was useless, as they were finally overpowered, and rather than be taken alive by the followers of Mohammed, committing suicide. The massacres were on a scale unparalleled in history, and as a result of the pillaging and burning of roof trees by Turks and Kurds, the greatest devastation prevails in Asiatic towns where the dread plague of typhus fever broke out among the survivors. Hundreds of fugitives fled to the mountains where they are in a dying condition from hunger and cold. The survivors were in a state of despair, not knowing where to turn for help.

In one village the massacre lasted two days, during which time all kinds of excesses were committed, and Armenian women and girls were outraged by Turkish soldiers as well as by the marauders, the scenes enacted being too horrible for description.

A BLACK LIST.

A Measure for the Protection of Users of Diamond Bys.

In certain districts the ladies complain that they are frequently deceived by merchants and dealers when Diamond Bys are asked for.

Various tactics are adopted by dishonest storekeepers to push on their customers cheap and worthless dyes.

"Some dealers actually go to the length of dyeing a white material to extol the qualities of a dye without a reputation or fame; some use the old deceptive phrase, 'I have something just as good as the 'Diamond'; others will content themselves by hurriedly wrapping up some poor make of dye, unless the buyer demands to see the package. All this mean and nefarious work is done because the cheap and worthless dyes pay larger profits than the reliable Diamond Dyes."

For the protection of users of the celebrated Diamond Dyes, we have commenced a "Black List," wherein will appear the names of all defrauding and deceiving dealers who do not give their customers what they ask for, and steps will be taken to expose the business tactics of all such dealers and merchants. We will also direct the attention of the ladies to the high standard of quality of the goods just what they ask for, and steps will be taken to expose the business tactics of all such dealers and merchants. We will also direct the attention of the ladies to the high standard of quality of the goods just what they ask for, and steps will be taken to expose the business tactics of all such dealers and merchants.
