The mail steamer Vancouver arrived at 5 a. m. after an eventful voyage. Soon after leaving Moville she met a gale, and for two nights and a day the decks were swept by heavy seas. On Friday morning while proceeding slowly an enormous iceberg loomed up directly ahead, and before the steamer could be checked she crushed into it. The iron plates at the bow were bent out. There was considerable alarm. Capt. Leudall recorded in the log, "one of the most trying voyages I have had for many a year." There were three hundred intermediate and steerage passengers and two hundred saloon.
