Murder Could Not Kill

INSTALLMENT 11.

Glady Beatson's bus journey finished near the end of Oxford Street, not far short of Tottenham Court Road, she descended opposite Wardour Street, crossed and hurried along the busy little thoroughfare until she reached the entrance to a small commonplace building where a rounded brass plate was displayed with the legend: "Maurice Gordon, Ltd., Commission Agents."

The office in which she found herself had the usual appearance of that of a commission agent in a small way of business. In this outer room three clerks, two girls and a man, were engaged writing, with telephones beside them.

At Beatson's entrance the man looked up. He was pale, lanky, sharp-eyed and youthful. His expression, as his gaze fell on the visitor, plainly showed that he was considerably taken aback.

Quickly he jumped to his feet and strode over to her as she stood at the counter.

"Quick! what's happened? What's brought you 'ere"? he asked in an alarmed whisper.

"Nothing, Mr. Benson," she replied, smiling. "Why everything's all right. Is Maurice in? It's him I want to speak to."

"Yes, he's in," said the other, looking at her apprehensively, "but... Well, I s'pose you'd better see 'im since you're 'ere."

He lifted the flap of the counter,

Stanley Bridge Residents Called On Mercy Mission During Recent Storm

On Sunday, April 8th., during one of the worst storms of the season, the people of Stanley Bridge and vicinity were called out on a mercy mission when it was known that Miss Kathryn Reid was suffering from an acute attack of appendicitis which necessitated her removal to the hospital.

Due to weather conditions it was impossible for the car conveying the patient to secure a plane and after contacting the Dept. of Public Works they were informed that there was only one snow plough available from Summerside and they would only clear the paved highway. This however did not daunt our valiant men who gathered together and proceeded to open the road, and by means of a tractor, two trucks, and thirty men with shovels, the car conveying the patient was able to make the trip to the highway, a distance of several miles. They were met by Davidson's ambulance and proceeded to the hospital where a successful operation was performed.

passed her through and led the way to the door of an inner apartment. He knocked, and without waiting for an answer gently opened it, edging the woman inside before him.

Maurice Gordon was seated at his desk, but sprang to his feet as he saw Gladys Beatson.

"Quick, out with it!" he said, almost livid with apprehension.

"What's gone wrong?"

"Nothing, Maurice; nothing has gone wrong. Don't look at me like that. You frighten me." The quaver in her voice testified to the truth of her final remark, as she glanced in alarm from one to the other of the two men.

"Frighten you! D'you mean to tell me you come along here, and — you're sure there's nothing wrong?"

"What could there be? I came along just to see you — to tell you everything was all right. And now all you can do is carry on like this. I thought you'd be pleased."

She sank into a chair and took a folded handkerchief from her bag. Dabbing the cambrio to her nose reproachfully, she repeated tearfully: "And I thought you'd be pleased."

"Pleased! Oh, my God! Can't you see I'm delighted," Gordon snarled. Curtly he jerked his head to Benson as a signal to withdraw, making an angry grimace of disgust as he did so.

"Oh, for heaven's sake quit that sniffing. Can't you see for yourself what you've done? What made you come here?"

"I just wanted to tell you, Maurice, dear, that everything was all right." With an effort she checked her sobs. "You know you told me what to say if Miss Dexter or anyone started to ask questions of me about last night. Well, she didn't ask me anything at all; not a word. She hasn't questioned any of the maids either. Yet she knows he's gone. She found that out this morning when Mr. Foster called. She must have seen the mess, yet she hasn't said a word. That seemed a bit strange, and I wanted to let you know."

"Fat lot o' help you are! Didn't I explain to you, you fool, that it was more than odds on that she'd say nothing about it? How the blazes could she, without giving herself away? I put you wise what to say just in case she did speak. But though she hasn't said anything, that doesn't mean she hasn't twigged nothing, or that she's not doing nothing. Didn't I tell you you hadn't to be seen with me at any price? — not till things blows over, anyway. Can't I never make you understand?"

"Oh, Maurice, dear, I was extra careful. My lady was going out when she met Mr. Foster on the doorstep. They went off walking through the Park. I watched them go — and that means they're out till after tea. I'm any judge. Anyway, I told cook I was going along to Netting Hill to match a bit of silk. No one could possibly see me coming here."

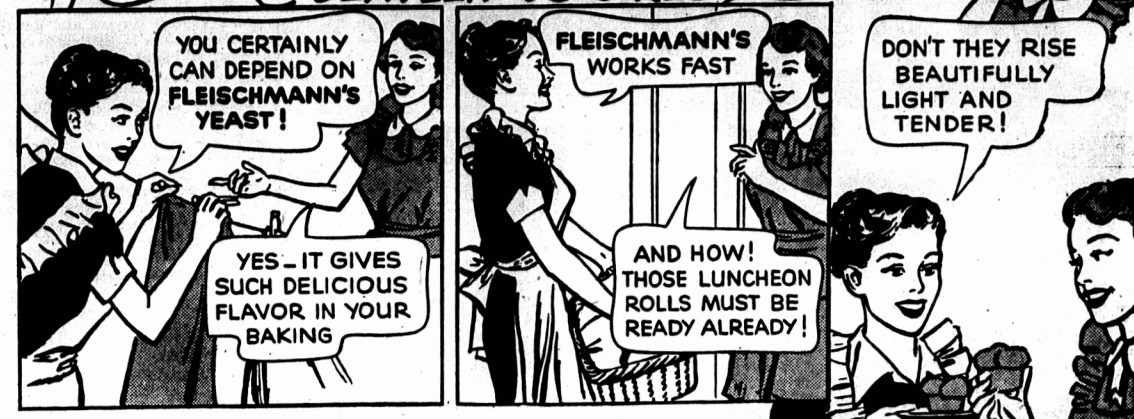

"I wish I could be as sure as you. You're in this, too, don't you forget. I'll lay a fiver you came straight on here from Porchester Crescent. You all seem to be working to queer my pitch."

"But I did want to see you, Maurice, and to tell you. I did think you'd be pleased to know that, even if you're not pleased to see me. After all I've done, you haven't been very kind to me."

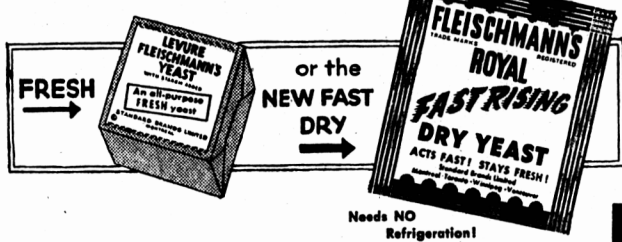

"Kind! Oh, well, go easy, Gladys. I'm a bit rattled just now with one thing and another, and you busting in here doesn't improve things. Now you just hop it, there's a good girl. Blubbing don't make you look any better."

He rose as he spoke and moved towards the door. With a swift movement the young woman stepped close to him, preventing him from opening it. "You will see me again, won't you, Maurice?" "Oh, yes, of course. Now run along, there's a good kid." "When will you see me?" "Oh; for... There, there, I dunno exactly, but I'll send word. I'll rig you — I'll post you a line. Dammit, I thought you said you loved me? Give me half a chance! D'you want to risk my neck?" Her head moved in terrified disavowal; but still she did not go.

CAKE MIXES

CONTAIN NO EGG POWDER ... YOU ADD A Fresh Egg AND GET A BETTER CAKE

Higher Cakes, Lighter Texture, Fresher Flavour!

Every housewife knows that fresh eggs help to make a home-baked cake high, light and fine-textured. The same is true with a cake mix. The fresh egg that you add to Robin Hood Cake Mix makes a world of difference!

The Only Cake Mix Which Contains No Egg Powder

After months of testing, Robin Hood discovered that the last-minute addition of a fresh egg makes consistently better cakes. They also discovered that without egg powder, there is no danger of the cake mix becoming stale in the package. You can safely keep on hand 5 to 6 packages of Robin Hood. It takes you only seconds to break a fresh egg into Robin Hood Cake Mix, and the result is a tall, high, fresh-tasting cake, every time.

2 Out of 3 Preferred Robin Hood Mixes

When we asked 300 women to make a comparison test with Robin Hood and other leading brands of cake mix, 2 out of 3 women voted for Robin Hood Cake Mix. They said they preferred Robin Hood Cake Mix because of the difference the fresh egg makes. Try Robin Hood Cake Mix and see for yourself.
