Trypsin Seen As Important

NEW YORK (AP)—After five years work, scientists have spelled out one vital "sentence" in the chemistry of life. They have determined the exact chemical structure of trypsin, an enzyme that breaks down proteins in the food you eat so the proteins become available for nourishment.

The human body has hundreds of enzymes, each engaged in a m.w.k.i.g. some particular chemical reaction take place. The trypsin research provides a springboard for studying how enzymes perform their amazing duties.

Determination of the structure was achieved by Dr. Hans Neurath, Dr. Kenneth A.A. Walsh, Dorothy L. Kaufman and Dr. K. S. V. Sampath Kumar of the University of Washington, Seattle.

Trypsin is one of the long-known enzymes, containing a total of 223 amino acids (the "bricks" of proteins) arranged in a long chain, and in precise sequence of just 20 of the amino acids. This sequence is the "sentence."

Trypsin is produced in the pancreas gland in an inactive form called trypsinogen. It is converted in the intestine to the active form, or trypsin, by action of another enzyme which breaks off one-fourth of the larger trypsinogen molecule.

SOVIET POWER
The Siberian power system, Russia claims, will produce more than 140,000,000,000 kw of cheap electricity by 1970.
