

The Proud Lady of the Castle.

Last of the mighty race of Windeck, famed for brave men and lovely women was Adelheid, heiress of the castle and broad lands that had been owned by her ancestors, and so far as beauty went, she was worthy of her lineage, but of a proud and haughty temper. So proud was she that among all the nobles of Brisgan she could find none whom she thought worthy to call her lord, and year after year passed on, finding her still unwedded and every year some unfortunate lover or other turned from the castle gates with looks of scorn and words of ridicule.

Among these whom she, after her fashion, first attached to her by every art and afterward repelled by bitter derision, was a young man of noble family but slender fortune, who had long been in her service as page or squire, as the fashion of those days demanded.

After years of patient waiting and hope, the youth ventured to declare himself and was received by the lady with a storm of sarcasms that literally overwhelmed him. Stung to the heart by her hard speeches and by the sense of his own folly and presumption which suddenly poured in upon him like a flood, he left his mistress's presence only to write a word of farewell to his mother, whom he tenderly loved and whose only son he was, then threw himself into the Rhine.

A few days afterward a woman maddened with rage and sorrow, a widow whose only son had died a suicide's death sought the Lady Adelheid in her castle on the hill, accused her of being the murderess of her boy and heaped upon her head the bitterest curses that her outraged mother-heart could devise or her woman's tongue utter.

'Unloved you shall live,' she cried, 'and unregretted die. Even in the grave you shall find no peace, even there my revenge shall follow you and send you forth to wander, a restless, miserable ghost—restless forever.'

'Ah!' cried Lady Adelheid, with white face and scared eyes, all her haughtiness fled, 'do not utter such terrible words! Have you no mercy? The wretched mother smiled grimly.

'Yes, I have mercy,' she said. 'Thus shall your spirit wander through those very halls until you find a lover as true, as honest, as purehearted as my poor lost son, willing to woo the phantom for his bride. Then only shall you rest in peace.'

Under this curse, says the legend, the Lady Windeck lived and died. She was the last of her race, and not many years after her death the castle, uninhabited and deserted, fell into ruins. Its new owners had, indeed, made many attempts to inhabit it, but had been absolutely driven out of the place by the unearthly sounds which disturbed the stillness of the night, and which scarcely allowed a living soul in the building so much as to close an eye from midnight to cock-crow. Doors would open and shut mysteriously, footsteps resound through the silent corridors, lights, illumined by no visible hand, suddenly burn in the windows, while in every mirror in the house, the shadowy form of a woman clothed in white, with long black hair hanging below her shoulders, would be seen, would pass—disappear in one place only to appear the next moment in another.

It happened, however, that one day a young hunter of noble family, a stranger guest in one of the neighboring castles, was led in the excitement of the chase, up to the gate of the deserted mansion. The deer which he was pursuing rushed by him into the very ruins as though it were taking sanctuary. The young man, by name Kurt Von Stein, had heard some curious legends connected with a ruined castle on the height and possibly half from curiosity and half because he was hot and tired with a day of specially poor sport, he dismounted and led his horse, tired like himself, through the brambles and bushes that had overgrown the gateway, into the grass-grown court-yard.
