NOTICE!

THE UNDERSIGNED takes this opportunity of returning thanks to the large number of his customers who have so promptly complied with his terms and paid for their work on delivery. There are, however, a considerable number who have not paid thus promptly; and he respectfully requests all such to call and pay their respective accounts without delay. He would further remind them that their respective amounts, although a trifle to each, would in the aggregate materially assist in making up some of the deficit which their indebtedness has occasioned

A Fortune for Sale!

IN consequence of the death of the Proprietor, the Subscriber is instructed to offer for positive Sale, that beautifully situated well known property, the

Half Way House, Vernon River,
PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

The Land consisting of about 40 acres, is in that state of cultivation that it has been for some years past, and will for years to come, yield a clear net profit, more than sufficient to pay the interest on the amount of purchase money asked for the whole establishment. As a money making investment this is an opportunity seldom equalled in these Provinces, which fact can be positively proved to any person about purchasing The Stock of Liquors and Stock of Goods in the Store can be taken or not at the option of the purchaser.

AN ADDRESS TO HORACE GREELEY.

BY OLIVER OGLESBY.

He was the mildest mannered man
That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat.—Byron

In the words of that strange medley, which the negro minstrels shout,
"How are you, Horace Greeley? Does your mother know you're out?"
If she does, she surely merits gravest censure for permitting
Her impracticable boy thus to wander from her knitting.

Now, by all the sense and nonsense that e'er oxed their source to thee,
By the memories of impeachment and the ball-bond of J. D
I implore thee, pause and ponder, in thy whirligig career,
While I pour my rhyming greeting into thy reluctant ear.

* * * * * * * *

Hail! to the Tribune's doughty knight, whose voice is ever heard
Defending all that's glorious and all that's most absurd;
Long may his coat tail on the breeze be borne triumphantly,
Who fights to make the freemen slaves—to make the bondmen free.

The advocate of right and wrong, so epiteful, yet so meek,
The champion of the oppressed, the oppressor of the weak;
Dusk Ethiopia's sons shall sound his fame with trumpet tone—
The liberator of their race—the enslaver of his own;

The most humane, enlightened sage, that e'er with despot's sword,
Against fair freedom's sacred shrines, led forth a barbarous horde;
The justest man that e'er assailed, with threats, a judge's ear,
To turn the scales of justice with the counterpoise of fear.

Ho! all ye savage tribes of earth—black, yellow, red, or blue—
The great Republic of the West holds out her arms to you;
To you, the proud Caucasian race, is dearest rights shall yield;
For thus the Lord of Hosts hath sworn—as Greeley hath revealed.

From far Alaska's frost bound coast to the Borneo's spicy vales,
Come with your feasts of dogs and cats, of roots and rats, and snails;
Come with your gods of wood and stone, of monkey's snakes and goats;
Here practice all your hellish rites, but help us with your votes.

Come from your hemes in ocean isle, dark wood, or mountain glen,
And claim your God invested right to rule enlightened men;
The pyramid of freedom then shall soar up to the moon—
Mongolian, Negro, Hottentot, Australian, and Baboon.

Now, Horace Greeley, fare the well! and, though obscure my name,
My little rill of song may swell the current of thy fame;
Columbia's sons review thy life, and join with one accord,
To bless thee for the moral which thy words and deeds afford.

They learn, as they contemplate all thy plausible, yet vain,
Impracticable theories—those cobwebs of the brain—
How helpless is the zeal that lacks discretion for its guide—
How foolish is the wisdom that casts common sense aside.

THE OLD HOUSE IN THE FOREST

'Yes, poets may sing of sunny climes, but I shall never forget one night of horror I spent in the 'boot shaped land;' and the speaker, a middle-aged man drew his chair to the fire, while the group about him listened.

Without the old building, the wind held revel among the trees, and from the mountains beyond old Boreas blew terrific blasts that swept through the valley below; all proclaiming the near approach of winter.

It was a very cold day on which I started to go to Luzerne, where my brother lay ill.

I had received a letter from him, telling me to come right on as he was dying; he was immensely rich, owning several estates, and he had no family having never married.

I was but a poor artist, struggling hard to live. No wonder I hastened to prepare for my journey, which would take me several days.

The narrator paused for a moment; then continued.

'I took the lumbering stage coach that passed through our village, and being well muffled, I scarcley felt the cold. We made but slow progress, the wheels in some places sinking to hubs in the yielding snow. The poor horses had a hard time of, and threatened every minute to give out. On either side of the road, a dark dense forest walled us in, and the trees cracking with the frost sounded from afar, like the discharge of musketry. The day wore on, and late at night I reached the cross-roads, and stepped from the stage coach

Here I bade the driver 'good night,' and began my journey. I sank in some places up to my waist in the drifting snow, and found it difficult to keep in the narrow path. The gleam of the moon (which labored to show itself through the clouds which were driven before it) lit up my way through the forest; the wind swept in guests that hurled volumes of snow in my path, impeding my progress and nearly blinding me.

Several times I was tempted to turn back. I had as a sort of a companion an old cane, which had lain about my dwelling for a long time. I had not taken it for protection, for I relied not upon that for defence. From afar came the howls of famished wolves, and I dreaded meeting those disagreeble companions. It was such a night as few would care to undertake a journey in, and to make it more dismal, huge, flakes of snow began to fall.

Suddenly I became numb. A feeling of sleep stole over me, and I knew the intense cold was taking effect upon my body. I scarcley could walk. I pinched myself, tore my hair, and did all I could to prevent my falling into the snow to sleep.

With a despairing cry I reeled and plunged forward. It was my last effort to shake off the drowsiness, when a short distance off a light gleamed through the falling snow. It was like a ray of light from heaven. I staggered on and ere many minutes felt at the door of a small dilapidated house, from the window of which streamed the light I had seen.

With my cane I showered blows upon the door, and sank back almost dead. The door opened and a gruff voice inquired 'who's there?'

With a feeble cry I attempted to raise myself, when the man caught sight of me and helped me in. The warmth of the fire soon restored me, and I was able to sit up. 'You're well now,' said my deliverer; 'go way from here, we don't keep a tavern.'

'But' said I 'let me stay here for the night, I will pay you well. I'll die if I go out again.'

'Die then,' muttered the man, between his clenched teeth, and without another word left me by a smaller door.

Being alone, I now looked about me. The room was devoid of furniture. The only thing in it was the old stool I sat upon. From below me came the sound of smothered voices and the smell of smeltering metal came through the cracks of the floor.

I stooped down and applied my eye to a chink in the flooring. In a subterranean chamber were several men; a crucible containing metal was over a charcoal fire. One of the men was pouring out the metal into dies. Several others were stamping marks upon them.

I saw it all. I was in a den of counterfeiters.

Should they suspect me, I was lost.

By chance I raised my eyes and with a shudder saw in the doorway the burly form of the man, who had just left me. A horrible smile lit up his savage counteannce.

'Look again' he said, 'but you'll never tell what you saw. That peep has cost you your life; dead men tell no tales.'

'What—ho, there Bernard, Paul and the rest of you. Come up here,' the villian shouted, and the men from below rushed to his side. Their scowling faces and sinister looks gave me no hope for mercy.

'Yonder is an intruder. He has discovered our secret. What is the penalty.'

The villan looked at the murderous set behind him. Through their set teeth came the hissing word, 'death.'

In vain I swore I would never betray them. Several rushed at me, and weak as I was, I was soon lying at their feet.

'In what manner will he die,' asked the man who seemed to be their leader.

'By the lead' answered the villians. In vain I tried to think what mode of death was awaiting me, when horror! I saw it at once, as one of the grinning wretches brought from below a crucible with molten lead.

I was to die by having it poured in my ears; I shudder at the thought now, though 'tis long ago.

'Bind him to the floor,' shouted the chief. No, stay, hold him down. Bernard do your duty.'

The villian called Bernard seized a small ladle and filled it with the fiery metal, and approached me. How I prayed to heaven in those few seconds? With a groan of agony I tried to turn my head, but it was held in the grasp of my captor.

Just as Bernard was to pour the lead, a shrill whistle echoed through the old building The effect was instantaneous.

I was released, the lamp extinguished, and all was silent as the grave. Over my mouth was placed a 'kerchief and it was impossible to cry out.

A minute passed! great heavens how I prayed, fervently and devoutly. The danger was passed, again the lamp was lit; now was my time. Before the flickering flame could light up the gloom, sprang forward, and with a terrible blow knocked one that opposed me down, stunned and bleeding. At my feet lay my cane. Scarcley knowing what I did, I picked it up. As I did so the villians uttered a cry of rage, and sprang towards me.

With the courage of desperation, I raised my cane for a blow, but before it could descend it was wrenched from my grasp and hurled away. Still I held something in my hand. One look, thank heaven it was a long blade. My walking stick proved to be a sword cane.

In less time then it takes to write it they were at me again. I watched my chance, and as the leader advanced to seize me, my blade was buried to the hilt in his heart.

Without a groan he fell to the floor.

I then dashed myself against the door. It gave way and I found myself in the open air. The snow was falling in blinding masses. Scarcley knowing where I went, I plunged into the darkness followed by my pursuers, and a pistol ball cut the air close to my head.

It was life or death to me, and I strained every muscle as I ran wildly on.

I knew from the direction I was going that I must be nearing the river. A small bridge crossed it—if I could but reach that, there was a house not far from it. There, at least, I would be safe.

A few more moments and I was on the banks of the river. I looked up and down the stream. The bridge was gone. The ice and tide had swept it away. The river was frozen, but not sufficiently thick to bear my weight. I then looked back in the gloom beyond, and saw the forms of my assailants coming.

'Better die by water than at their hands, I cried, and after a short prayer, I stepped upon the ice. It rocked and surged beneath my weight, but I kept on. My pursuers, reached the river, and seeing me half way over, they uttered a cry of joy and rushed after me. They fired several shots at me that whistled harmlessly by.

Suddenly I heard a loud crashing roar, a cry of despair and the splashing of water. I looked back saw several forms clinging to the ragged sides of the ice, uttering shrieks for help.

The vengeance of heaven had overtaken them. They had sank beneath the ice. In a moment all was quite. Nothing save the large opening in the ice, and the gloom beyond met my gaze. How I passed over the yawning gulf that lay under the thin sheet of ice, I never can tell but I look upon it as miracle from heaven.

With faltering steps I reached the opposite shore, and staggered to the house before mentioned.

In the tap room, although late, were seated several soldiers and peasants. My arrival among them in such a plight, caused quite a sensation, and my story was scarcley believed. I called them to the door.

In the distance a lurid glare lit the murky sky and I knew the haunt of the counterfeiters was in flames. As we looked, a low rumble was heard and burning objects were seen for a moment in the air; then darkness settled o'er the scene. I then continued on my journey I saw my brother and he breathed his last in my arms, willing all his property to me. On my return I saw the ruins of the old house. About it stood several curious tourists who recognized me as the hero of the adventure. It is long since that happened, but the scenes of that night are vividly impressed on my mind.

A MAN who marries a rich wife must expect occasionally to have it flung in his teeth. We have heard of a retort, however, which we should think must have forever silenced such tirades. A gentleman who had the misfortune to marry a fortune was once exhibiting the fine points of his horse to a friend.

'My horse, if you please,' said his wife; 'my money bought that horse.' 'Yes, madam,' replied the husband, bowing, 'and your money bought me too.'

INDIAN HUMOR.—'I am glad,' said the Rev. Dr. Y——to the Chief of the little Ottawas, 'that you do not drink whiskey, but it grives me to find that your people use so much of it.' 'Ah yes!' replied the Chief, and he fixed an impressive eye upon the doctor, which communicated the reproof before he uttered but we Indians use a great deal of whiskey, it, we do not make it.'
