THE PIRATE.

By Sir Walter Scott.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"D—n me," said Bunce, who easily conjectured what was passing in the mind of his prisoner—"that pause would have told well on the stage—it would have brought down pit, box and gallery, egad, as Bayes has it.

"I will hear nothing of Bayes," said Claud Halero, (himself a little elevated,) "it is an impudent satire on glorious John; but he tickled Buckingham off for it—

"In the first rank of these did Zimi stand: A man so various—"

"Hold your peace!" said Bunce, drowning the voice of the admirer of Dryden in louder and more vehement asseveration, "the rehearsal is the best farce ever written—and I'll make him kiss the gunner's daughter that denies it. D—n me, I was the best Prince Prettyman ever walked the boards—

"Sometimes a fisher's son, sometimes a prince: But let us to business. Hark ye, old gentleman," (to Magnus), "you have a sort of unlikeliness about you, for which some of my profession would cut your ears out of your head, and broil them for your dinner with red pepper. I have known Goffe do so to a poor devil for looking sour and dangerous when he saw his sloop go to Davy Jones's locker with his only son on board. But I'm a spirit of another sort; and if you or the ladies are ill-used, it shall be the Kirkwall people's fault, and not mine, and that's fair; and so you had better let them know your condition, and your circumstances, and so forth,—and that's fair, too."

Magnus, thus exhorted, took up the pen, and attempted to write; but his high spirit so struggled with his paternal anxiety, that his hand refused its office. "I cannot help it," he said, after one or two illegible attempts to write—I cannot form a letter, if all our lives depended on it."

And he could not, with his utmost efforts, suppress the convulsive emotions which he experienced, but that they agitated his whole frame. The willow which bends to the weight of a great often escapes better than the oak which resists it; and so, in great calamities, it sometimes happens that light and frivolous spirits recover their elasticity and presence of mind sooner than those of a loftier character. In the present case Claud Halero was fortunately able to perform the task which the deeper feelings of his friend and patron refused. He took the pen, and, in a few words as possible, explained the situation in which they were placed, and the cruel risks to which they were exposed, insinuating at the same time, as delicately as he could express it, that, to the magistracy of the country, the life and honor of its citizens should be a dearer object than even the apprehension or punishment of the guilty; taking care, however, to qualify the last expression as much as possible, for fear of giving umbrage to the pirates.

Bunce read over the letter, which fortunately met his approbation; and, on seeing the name of Claud Halero at the bottom, he exclaimed, in great surprise, and with more energetic expressions of asseveration than he could express it, "Why, you are the little fellow that played the fiddle to old Manager Gadabout's company, at Hogs Norton, the first season I came out there! I thought I knew your catchword of glorious John."

At another time this recognition might not have been very grateful to Halero's minstrel pride; but as matters stood with him, the discovery of a golden mine could not have made him more happy. He instantly remembered the very hopeful young performer who came out in Don Sebastian, and John had added, that the music of glorious John had never received such excellent support during the time that he was first (he might have added, and only) violin to Mr. Gadabout's company.

"Why, yes," said Bunce, "I believe you are right. I might have shaken the scene as well as Booth or Betterton either. But I was destined to figure on other boards," (striking his foot upon the deck) "and I think I must stick by them, till I find no board at all to support me. But now, old acquaintance, I will do something for you—sue yourself this way a bit—I would have you sue." They leaned over the railing, while Bunce whispered with more seriousness than he usually shewed. "I am sorry for this honest old heart of Norway pine—blight me if I am not—and for the daughters, too—besides, I have my own reasons for befriending one of them. I can be a wild fellow with a willing lass of the game; but to such decent and innocent creatures—d—n me, I am Scipio at Numantia, Alexander in the tent of Darius. You remember how I touch off Alexander!" (here he started into heroics:—

"Thus from the grave I rise to save my love; All draw your swords, with wings of lightning When I rush on, sure none will dare to say— 'Tis beauty calls, and glory shews the way."

Claud Halero failed not to bestow the necessary commendations on his declaration, declaring that in his opinion as an honest man, he had always thought Mr. Altamont's giving the speech far superior in tone and energy to Betterton.

Bunce, or Altamont, wrung his hand tenderly. "Ah, you flatter me, my dear friend," he said; "yet, why had not the public some of your judgment! I should not then have been at this pass. Heaven knows, my dear Mr. Halero, Heaven knows with what pleasure I could keep you on board with me, just that I might have one friend who loves as much to hear, as I do to recite, the choicest pieces of our finest dramatic authors. The motto of us are beasts—and, for the Kirkwall hostage younder, he uses me, egad, as I use the more I do for him. But how delightful would it be in a tropic night, when the ship was hanging on the breeze, with a broad and steady sail, for me to rehearse Alexander, with you for my pit, box and gallery! Nay, (for you are a follower of the muses, as I remember,) who knows but you and I might be the means of inspiring, like Orpheus and Eurydice, a pure taste into our companions, and softening their manners, while we excited their better feelings?"

This was spoken with so muchunction, that Claud Halero began to be afraid he had both made the actual punch over pot, and mixed too many bewitching ingredients in the cup of flattery which he had administered, and that, under the influence of both potions, the sentimental pirate might detain him by force, merely to realize the scenes which his imagination presented. The conjecture was, however, too delicate to admit of any active effort on Halero's part, to redeem his blunder, and therefore he only returned the tender pressure of his friend's hand, and uttered interjection "alas!" in as pathetic a tone as he could.

Bravery.

Many deeds of reckless daring are never recorded, but here is one chronicled by no less a man than the great Duke of Wellington. He was once asked who, in his opinion, was the bravest man at Waterloo. "I can't tell you that," he said; "but I can tell you of one than whom I am sure was no braver. He was only a private in the artillery, but he had served the day through he would have been an officer. A farmhouse, with an orchard surrounded by a thick hedge, formed a most important point in the British position, and was ordered to be held against the enemy at any hazard or sacrifice. The hottest of the battle raged round this point, but the English behaved well and beat back the French, though they attacked the place again and again with great fury. At last the powder and ball were found to be running short; at the same time the timber in heiges took fire, and the orchard was soon surrounded by a ring of flame. A messenger, however, had been sent to the rear for more powder and ball, and in a short time two loaded wagons came galloping down to the farmhouse, the gallant defenders of which were keeping up a thin and scanty fire through the flames which surrounded their post. The driver of the first wagon, with the reckless daring of an English boy spurred his struggling and terrified horses through the burning heap; but the flames rose fiercely round, and caught the powder, which exploded in an instant, sending wagon, horses and rider in fragments into the air. For one instant the driver of the second wagon paused, appalled by his comrade's fate; the next, observing that he flames, beaten back for a moment by the explosion, affording him one desperate chance, he sent his horses at the smouldering breach, and amid the deafening cheers of the garrison, landed the terrible cargo safely within. Behind him the flame closed up, and raged more fiercely than ever.

Hindoo Women.

Widow Ramabal, a high caste Hindoo woman, is exerting herself in the States to raise money to assist the women of India to become educated. Many influential ladies and gentlemen are taking an active interest in the cause she advocates, and have formed a "Ramabal Society," which has "circles" in many places. The widow is described as a slender, delicate woman, about thirty years old, who tells her sad story in simple and beautiful English. She says that there are 21,000,000 widows in India, and that their condition is most deplorable. Some 600,000 of these widows are under twenty years of age and there are 79,000 more children, not more than nine years old. Many marriages are contracted in India when the parties are in their infancy. When the husband dies it is believed that his death is caused by some crime committed by the wife in a previous state of existence, and she is consequently very badly treated. Except the widow belongs to a low caste she is not allowed to marry again. It is to procure some amelioration of the unhappy lot of this unfortunate class of her countrywomen that the widow Ramabal has devoted her life. The prospect is that she will be able to collect enough money to build and endow the modest college she proposes to establish.
