

Find Carbon Monoxide Gas Killed Miners In Seconds

MARCINELLE, Belgium (Reuters)—Death came suddenly to one of the 276 miners entombed after fire broke out last Wednesday in a coal mine here.

A rescue worker told Wednesday of finding some bodies with bread in their hands and mouths, grim evidence that a wave of deadly carbon monoxide gas had engulfed them suddenly.

Rescue worker Jean Baptiste Pellegrinelli said he found them among a group of 40 sitting with their lunches beside them. "Everything showed they died instantly," Pellegrinelli said.

The gas still is in the mine. Three exhausted rescuers were taken out on stretchers Wednesday night, overcome through incorrect use of their oxygen masks.

FEAR TYPHUS OUTBREAK

All of the 94 bodies found so far had been brought to the surface. Rescuers, spurred by the fear of a typhus outbreak caused by the decaying dead, fought to go still lower—down to the 3,000-foot level—where the rest of the 276 men trapped were believed to be.

Throughout the day, as masked workers came to the surface with their grim burdens, soldiers wearing rubber gloves washed the rescuers in buckets of disinfectants. The dead largely were unrecognizable after having lain in the hot tunnels for more than a week. Hope was abandoned that any of the trapped men would be found alive.

Still, mine technicians pressed to find a new route to reach the deepest tunnels. Leon Elis Troclet, Belgian's labor minister, said a new route did exist but it entailed air-flow dangers for rescue workers near the 3,000-foot level.

Troclet said about half the 94 dead were Italian miners. One of them was identified by a package of candies he habitually carried.

Of the crowd still waiting for the mine gate, few remained who were relatives of missing men. Most of these had been taken home or to hospital after their long vigil.

Admits Murder Ten Years Ago

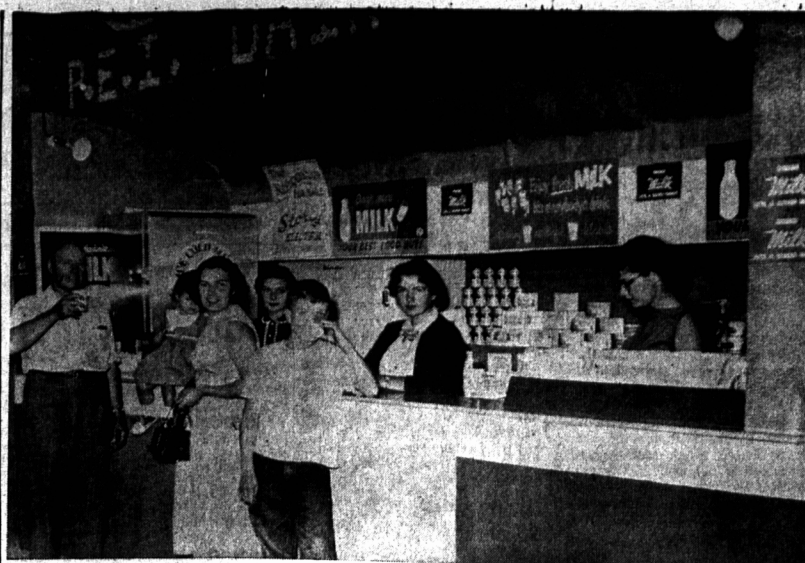

LONDON (Reuters)—Adam Ogilvie, 32-year-old laborer, made legal history here Wednesday by pleading guilty to an unsolved murder committed 10 years ago.

Ogilvie changed his plea from one of not guilty after being formally charged in court with murdering Mrs. Olive Michele Nixon, 57-year-old widow of a Malayan rubber planter, near London's Regents Park.

Mrs. Nixon, a church worker, was struck down within 100 yards of her home on a foggy November night in 1946 as she returned from a church meeting.

The crime was apparently motiveless and the inquest verdict on Mrs. Nixon was "murder by some person or persons unknown."

Police told Wednesday's court that Ogilvie had made a written statement which would be produced later.

Longest Village In The World Celebrates Bi-Centennial

CARAQUET, N.B. (CP)—Predominantly French-speaking residents along 20 miles of the north shore of the Bay of Fundy celebrate the 200th anniversary of the founding of "the longest village in the world" Aug. 19.

Religious ceremonies will play a major part in the celebrations here, where six churches answer the spiritual needs of the community's 6,000 residents.

Most Rev. C.A. LeBlanc, bishop of Bathurst, will celebrate pontifical high mass at the shrine of Ste. Anne du Bocage where Alexis buried. A statue in memory of Landry and the early Acadian pioneers will be unveiled following the mass.

An RCAF band from the Chatham, N.B. air base is expected to play its way along part of the 20-mile main street which Caraquet residents proudly claim is unequalled in length by any village anywhere.

The picturesque village, is a principal fishing port on the Bay of Chaleur which separates New Brunswick and Quebec.

It claims one of the continent's most modern codfish plants, as well as several firms engaged in processing catches for home and export markets.

Small freighters from world ports dock here to await cargoes of pitprops while the staccato of riveters' drills heralds a bustling prosperity in nearby shipyards.

It is in its churches, however, that Caraquet takes greatest pride.

Couched in a grove of spruce and beech trees is St. Anne's Shrine, site of annual pilgrimages by hundreds of Roman Catholics.

FIRST STONE CHURCH

A few miles away is the 92-year-old Church of St. Peter-in-Chains, built on the site of what was believed to have been the first stone church in New Brunswick, erected in 1818.
