THE FEMALE PIRATES.
The numbers of pirates who infested the Spanish Main in the early part of last century was so large that it can hardly appear credible that two women should be found among them of the same lawless and daring character. Yet the story of the two female pirates, Mary Read and Anne Bonny, is sufficiently remarkable to claim a place in our pages.

Mary Read was born in England. Her mother, who was married to a sailor, gave birth to a son soon after her husband had departed on a voyage, from which he never returned. When the child was a year old, the mother went to sea with her husband, and never returned for a time with her own friends. The boy soon afterwards died, his mother finding her in a state of assistance took a little girl, the heroine of our story, dressed her up as a boy, and she was passed off as such to a merchant vessel.
The merchant vessel was successful, and the widow was assisted with a weekly allowance, to ensure the continuance of which it was necessary that the girl whose name was Mary, should pass for a boy as long as the old woman lived.

A TERRIBLE EXPERIENCE.
I found out, "Sit still, or you will fall, Ben Lloyd!"
He crushed down and held on with clenched teeth, shivering and shaking. In after thought he felt that he ought to have been a spirit sent to warn and save him.
"Sit still," I repeated from time to time watching with aching eyes and brain for some sign of aid. Each minute seemed to be an hour. My legs grew dry, my tongue licked close to my mouth, and the perspiration on my forehead was like a blanket.
At last—hope came. The crowd began to gather in the yard, people were running in from distant lanes, and a sea of faces were turned upwards, then some one who had got a speaking trumpet shouted, "Keep hold and don't let go! A few minutes more and the kite begins to rise; higher and higher or it comes, on and on. How I watched the whole winged messenger, comparing it in my heart to an angel; and sur-ing as an angel was it permitted to come to me. I was hanging on the verge of despair.
Up it came near to me, guided
