Turmoil In South Viet Nam Causes Great Concern In U.S.

By LEWIS GULICK

WASHINGTON (AP) — Behind its careful statements, the Johnson administration is in deep dismay over South Viet Nam's internal turmoil and apparent U.S. inability to steer it to a constructive end.

So far, Washington strategists said Friday, the domestic turbulence has not cut deeply into the war effort against the Viet Cong. But the military campaign is bound to be affected in time and the civil unrest is now entering its fifth week.

Some countries already are beginning to have doubts about sending in more help to a country where an internal power struggle pervades the home front. For instance, South Korea now is reported having second thoughts about dispatching another 20,000 troops to South Viet Nam.

Of even greater concern to the administration would be a groundswell in U.S. public opinion to sending U.S. soldiers to fight and die for a distant people whose leaders seem snarled in politics-as-usual—excluding distinctly anti-American overtones.

The Communists have been asserting right along the American public eventually will force a U.S. pullout.

U.S. policymakers find themselves boxed in by frustrating limits on their choices.

On the one hand, the United States is 100 per cent committed to staying in South Viet Nam as long as needed to prevent a Communist takeover. On the other, it cannot step in to rule a friendly country as it could a defeated enemy like Germany or Japan after the Second World War.

Thus the U.S. choice is limited to ways of pushing ahead in the war effort with whatever governmental machinery is available at Saigon.

The depth of the U.S. commitment is one of the factors allowing the current political manoeuvring by South Vietnamese factions, in the opinion of U.S. analysts. With the United States pledged to Viet Nam's defence with 230,000 troops there so far and the anti-Viet Cong drive going fairly well, the Vietnamese politicians are said to feel freer to pursue their own goals than if the Communists were about to take over.

The U.S.-urged move by the Ky military regime toward a constitutional government, it is believed here, also has played a part in setting off the jockeying for position by the rival Vietnamese groups.

STILL SUPPORTS KY

The United States at this stage still is behind Premier Nguyen Cao Ky's regime. U.S. planes flew his troops to Da Nang to face dissidents and U.S. military police helped the government against demonstrators in the capital Friday.

Yet one of the limitations on U.S. involvement in the internal strife is the boomerang effect, Washington experts believe. Critics of the Ky leadership already contend it is bought by the United States and each further appearance of U.S. aid risks denunciation of "outside interference."

Johnson's advisers figure no matter what kind of constitutional or election procedure may be worked out, the backbone of real power in Saigon will remain for a long time to come with the military leaders. This is because the army has

Conservation Groups Oppose Banff Olympics

By RON MacDONALD

CALGARY (CP) — Conservationist groups in Canada have aligned themselves against the proposal to hold the 1972 Winter Olympics in Banff National Park, 60 miles west here.

The Banff Olympics bid will be accepted or rejected April 25 in Rome by the International Olympic Committee.

Conservation groups, in public statements and letters during the last year or more, have been arguing that the Olympics should not be held in any national park including Banff.

They say national parks are intended as natural preserves and the Olympics will not only destroy some of Banff's natural beauty but set a precedent for holding other major sports events there.

With the big sports events will come the hot-dog stands and motels; the conservationists argue, and eventually the park will be destroyed.

FEARS DAMAGE

The Alberta Fish and Game Association, with 17,000 members, says attractions as the Winter Olympics can cause serious damage to the national parks and destroy the principles on which the parks were established.

"There is real need in places like Banff and Jasper at the present time for a clear statement not only as to what areas may or will be zoned commercial, but also what areas are to be left unimpaired," the association says.

A year ago, the Canadian Society of Wildlife and Fishery Biologists, with 275 members, voted 99 to one at its annual convention in Calgary to send a letter of protest to Prime Minister Pearson, whose government has backed the Olympics bid, and to the International Olympic Committee.

Dr. William Fuller, associate professor of zoology at the University of Alberta, Edmonton, and co-chairman of the parks committee of the 3,000-member Canadian Audubon Society, told the Edmonton Natural History Club last February:

"It's time we stopped playing around with our natural resources on the advice of engineers.

RAP ENGINEERS

"Most engineers, especially the young ones, are soulless, and a soulless person should not be allowed to play around with something as priceless as our natural resources."

A number of engineers are involved in the Banff Olympic bid and in development of the Olympic site.

Richard C. Passmore of the 160,000-member Canadian Wildlife Federation, lodged protests with federal officials Feb. 12 in Ottawa on behalf of the Audubon Society, the Wildlife Federation, the Wildlife and Fishery Biologists and the National and Provincial Parks Association of Canada.

Mr. Passmore said the Olympics would result in an "intense disturbance" of natural conditions in Banff park.

On March 18 the Edmonton Bird Club's nine-man executive, acting on behalf of 100 members, notified the federal government that the bird club believes holding the Olympics in Banff is a contradiction of federal parks policy.
