Ethel De Wolfe

OR—

SHADOWS AND SUNSHINE.

BY S. M. BENT.

Onward flew the train, skirting the banks of the sunlit Delaware River, with the frozen fields stretching back to the blue hills in the background; past farm houses, and hamlets at cross roads, and little villages and towns, with their holiday groups wending their way to church; over the beautiful Susquehanna, with the smooth banks running down to the waters sleeping so quiet and smooth that the light breeze of morning scarce raised a ripple on the shining surface; through the broad fields of Maryland, catching occasional glimpses of the wide Chesapeake Bay, lying blue and calm in the distance; through the city of Baltimore, renowned in song and story, as the bells rang out their Christmas tones; and onward still, till, twelve or thirteen hours from starting, Washington was reached, and the long journey ended.

"For," thought she, "Paul is in the army of the Potomac, and in Washington I will be nearer him, if he be living, and I will not believe otherwise. I shall find him and ask him to care for me, and he will pity me, and forgive me all my seeming unworthiness, and I shall be his, and he mine. If he is wounded and ill, I shall nurse him back to health and strength again. I have now a woman's truest mission to fulfil."

After a night's rest, she went to the chief hospital, and asked for Dr. Manning, the surgeon in charge, whom she knew well, and who had accompanied the New York regiments from the time they started. Dr. Manning was told that a strange Sister was waiting to see him, and in response to his order she was conducted into the hospital dispensary, where he was busily engaged with prescriptions and drugs.

"Good morning, Sister," said the surgeon, as she entered; "please be seated, and let me know what I can do for you."

"Don't you recognize me, doctor?" asked she, as, with a merry laugh, she threw back her hood.

The surgeon, a huge weather-beaten giant, with grey hair and beard, deep blue eyes almost hidden by great shaggy brows, and a face "frosty but kindly," looked at her sharply for a moment, and then burst out, as she seized her hand:

"Ethel De Wolfe, by Jove! Why, Miss De Wolfe, the sight of your young face does me good. It comes like a streak of sunshine right from home. Pray, tell me, when and wherefore did you come to Washington, how did you leave your worthy father, and when and why did you become a nun?"

"One question at a time, doctor, please," said she, lightly, "and I will try and answer them all; but they involve a long story, and I want you to spare me the time, if you possibly can, to hear it, that you may advise me, and help me in my loneliness."

"My dear child, I am at your service, and you may confide in me as you would in your father. I can read trouble in your face. Trust me with it, and I will assist you in any way I can and not betray you, for, if I judge aright from your garb, you do not wish to be known to everyone you meet."

"Ah! doctor, those are the friendliest words I have heard for many a day. I knew I should find a firm friend in you, and that is why I came to you for counsel and help."

And then she told him all her trials, simply and trustfully, not omitting the slightest detail. As she finished she asked, blushing shyly:

"Do you know where Paul is?"

"My dear child," said the surgeon, "you took a grave step when you left your home on the eve of your marriage, but," added he, as he sprang to his feet and struck the desk before him a ringing blow, "you did right, perfectly right, and I'll thrash the scoundrel who says you didn't, and as long as I live you shall not want a friend. I'm proud that you got ahead of the Warner gang. Ha! ha! ha! you played them a pretty trick. But, my dear child," and his voice became low and soft as a woman's, "I am sorry for you, and we can only hope and trust for the best, but Paul was taken prisoner at Fredericksburg, and very many are never released from Southern prisons save by death."

"But Paul will be, if my prayers can save him, and there is a voice in my soul whispering hope, and telling me that we shall meet again."

"Amen to that, for he was a gallant officer and a brave soldier. You have a sanguine nature, my child, but when disappointment comes to such a one, irrevocably, when it realizes that it can hope no longer, the heart breaks, and merciful death soon follows. Hope and trust for the best, but be at all times prepared for the worst. How can I aid you, Ethel?"

"By allowing me to aid you, doctor; I have been an idle girl long enough, let me now be a woman and a worker; let me be in the hospital and learn its duties, so that I may go out with the brave men who are defending the Union, and on the battle field make their last hours brighter when they are struck down by bullet or bayonet. Let me learn now to be of some use in the world; let me join those noble women who have already made their names famous in that way."

"Are you in earnest, child; do you know the hardship, and misery, and suffering that lie before you when you ask this?"

"I am truly in earnest, and with God's help will not shrink my duty, however humble it be. But I must be known to you alone as Ethel De Wolfe. To others let me be known simply as 'Sister Margaret'; let my real name, till my soldier lover claims me, be, to all my friends but you, as that of one dead."

"It shall be just as you wish."

Cherry Hill Notes.

Farmers have begun haying. The crop, owing to the dry season, is said to be extremely light. This is much to be regretted, as there is no more useful crop to the farmer. With plenty of hay both his horses and cattle are kept in a thriving condition, and in consequence command a higher price when put on the market. Wheat and oats promise to be good, and although potatoes in some localities have missed greatly, yet on the whole a fair crop of the tubers are anticipated.

Temperance people are anxiously awaiting the appointment of inspectors to see that the Scott Act is properly enforced. They think the Government are in duty bound, by virtue of their pre-election promises to appoint them, and they are right. We all know the inspectors were promised, and now that the Government are handsomely sustained, we trust they will not forget to do their plain duty.

Hillsboro Lodge, I. O. G. T., meets here in the school room every Saturday evening. Large numbers attend the meetings, which are conducted in an orderly and dignified manner. The last night of meeting, however, was an exception to the general rule. After the lodge had adjourned, two small boys, who had evidently disagreed in their play, engaged in a real old fashioned encounter. Their hideous yells and vile imprecations in a short time attracted quite a large crowd, but before they had time to punish each other severely, our resident magistrate, nobly assisted by the Worthy Chief, succeeded in quieting matters down. Their parents, we hear, applied the "birchen rod" very effectively on their return home. This is right, and will no doubt have a salutary effect on the juvenile ruffians. The school master has evidently yet got a great work to do abroad.

The Presbyterians of West St. Peter's and Mount Stewart intend having a grand tea party about the middle of next month; full particulars of which will, no doubt, be given to the public in due time. The politicians on both sides should attend en masse. There is no better way of finding out the wants of their constituents than by attending a gathering of this kind and, besides, a few dollars spent on the ground might increase their popularity and at the same time help along a good cause.

Cherry Hill, July 27, 1886.

An English Ancestral Hall.

FORTHCOMING SALE OF LORD CHOLMONDLEY'S NORFOLK ESTATES.

London advices says: The most interesting social event this week will be the sale of Lord Cholmondley's Norfolk estates on Thursday. There will be great curiosity to learn who is the new owner of Houghton Hall, one of the most magnificent mansions in Great Britain, which possess enduring fame from its associations. Houghton property has belonged to the Walpoles and their descendants for 700 years. Sir Robert pulled down the manor-house and erected the present sumptuous mansion, which took thirteen years to build. Houghton is a most imposing house, placed in the midst of very picturesque parks long noted for the abundance and size of its trees. The hall, the gallery and the state rooms of the mansion are superb. Houghton was formerly famous with a certain circle for its rare and splendid collection of engraved books and prints, which had been brought from all parts of Europe. They were burnt by the late Lord Cholmondley, who ruthlessly consigned to the flames a copy of "Marco Antonio's Priceless Secret," a volume the pictures in which were designed by Raphael.

Houghton is haunted by two ghosts. Two brothers fought a duel there 300 years ago. One was killed and the spirit haunts the billiard room. There is also a famous brown lady, who enjoys the credit of having scared George IV. out of the house. This lady was Dorothy Walpole, wife of Charles, Lord Townshend, who died mysteriously after an unhappy life. She haunts the state bedroom. George IV., when Prince Regent, slept in this apartment. After his first night at Houghton he came down furiously angry and much excited, declaring, with many oaths, that he would not pass another night in the accursed house. He presently added: "I have seen that which I hope to God I may never see again." Months after he stated that on awaking in the night he had found standing by his bedside a little lady dressed all in brown, with dishevelled hair and a face of ashy paleness.

A Western Meteor Story.

People in the vicinity of Grafton, Ozaukee County, Wis., are very much excited over the fall of a meteor near that place. While a party of harvesters were at work one afternoon in a barley field on the farm of Henry Diedrick, a mile and a half south of the village, they were suddenly startled by a loud and strange noise, not unlike the roar of a long train of cars. The noise increased in volume to such a degree, during the space of only a few seconds, as to become almost deafening. The unusual sound seemed to come from the heavens, and, gazing upwards, the spectators saw what appeared to be a huge ball of smoke rapidly descending to the earth. It was a meteor. It struck the earth within a few rods of where the men were standing and buried itself deep in the ground. The news spread rapidly throughout the township and country, since which time Mr. Diedrick's barley field has been visited by hundreds of people, including many scientific men. The hole in the ground is three or four feet in circumference. Its depth is unknown, all attempts to find bottom by inserting long poles having, it is said, proved futile. Mr. Diedrick is now engaged in excavating the earth around the spot where the meteor lies embedded, and intends to bring it to the surface if it takes all summer.
