10,000

American and United Nations flags sprang up in the ranks of marchers. The columns moved eight abreast, arm-in-arm, in ranks three feet apart.

They were of many types and descriptions — white collared clergymen, beatnik college students in denim and sweaters, and old men and women, teenagers and babies.

PLACARDS BLOSSOMED

Red, white and blue placards blossomed from the throngs. One read: "We demand and end to police brutality." Another: "We demand equal voting rights."

The signs listed states and cities — Mississippi, Cincinnati; Selma; Philadelphia.

There were no white spectators in the area where the march began.

A mile away however, across the Alabama River Bridge at the outskirts of the business district, hundreds of white persons grouped beside the highway.

Cars with signs opposing the march appeared there. They included such legends as "Martin Luther King's county" and "I hate niggers."

Before the march began, King spoke at an inter-faith service at Browns Chapel.

"We know we can work within the framework of our democracy to bring about a brighter day," he said. He referred to the Alabama nickname, "heart of Dixie," and said:

"We will turn the 'heart of Dixie' into a state with a heart of brotherhood and freedom. . . we shall reach our goals. Alabama will be a new Alabama. Its children will finally enter the promised land."

Sheriff James G. Clark, the symbol of white resistance to the civil rights drive here, told reporters as the march began: "They have gotten everything they wanted from the federal government."

Clark was asked whether he thought they would get safely out of the city. He replied: "They won't get as far out as I want them."

In the front ranks were comedian Dick Gregory; John Lewis, national chairman of the student non-violent co-ordinating committee; and Mrs. Constance Baker Motley of New York, a veteran civil rights lawyer for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.
