The Unlatched Door

By Frank Price
CHAPTER NINE

The silence seemed to lengthen interminably as Roy Hemersley waited for Barbara to speak. At last, as she made no effort to respond to his advance, he drew back the hand he had laid on hers and said, in a disappointed tone: "I'm sorry if you think I am butting in where I have no right—"

"It isn't that!" she interrupted eagerly. "I know you want to be kind and I am grateful. If I thought there was anything you could do for me I would ask you—but there isn't!"

"Are you sure of that?"

"Quite sure that there is nothing I can ask you to do—for me."

"Do you mean without involving others?" he asked.

She was spared the necessity of answering by the arrival of the waiter with the first course. When they were alone again she anticipated further questions from Roy by asking:

"Why did you call Roger Borden 'Kruger'?"

"It's the name by which I know him best—a nickname that got stuck to him years ago in South Africa."

"The paper calls him a South African merchant."

"Merchant!" Roy gave a short, contemptuous laugh. "There are plenty of much less complimentary things they could have called him that would have been nearer the truth. 'But didn't you know that is what he was supposed to be?'"

"I know hardly anything about him. I don't suppose I have met him half a dozen times in my life."

"Then why—?" The impulsive question tingling on the tip of Roy's tongue was suppressed as he saw a defensive expression leap into her eyes. He regarded her with a puzzled frown for a moment and then asked quietly: "Hasn't Mr. Winterton told you anything about him?"

"Martin has never mentioned his name to me!" she assured him with emphasis. "I didn't even know they were acquainted until that scene occurred in the Boldovina last night."

"Didn't he explain that afterwards?"

"I haven't seen him to speak to since." Barbara was weighing every word. She felt that she was treading on dangerous ground and would be wiser to change the subject again. But the desire to learn what Roy knew or guessed impelled her to go on. "Did you know there was anything between them?"

"Rather! I was the cause of that row we saw going on."

"You?" She stared at him in amazement.

"There's not a doubt of it. Mr. Winterton as good as told me so when I joined him in the lobby where he was waiting for you and his wife to come out of the cloak-room."

"But what did you know about—?" Barbara checked herself abruptly on the verge of mentioning Nancy's letters.

"About Kruger Borden?" he took her up, following the line of his own thought without suspecting how far it led him from hers. "A great deal more than enough. He killed my father!"

FUNERAL TUESDAY — The funeral of Mrs. John Garland was held Tuesday morning from her late residence in Auburn to St. Patrick's Church, Fort Augustus, where Solemn Requiem High Mass was celebrated by the Pastor, Rev. T. P. Butler, assisted by Rev. Vincent Murnaghan as sub-deacon. The honorary pall bearers were: W. Chester S. McLure, Jack Doyle, Joseph Trainor, John McNally, Edward Roche and Damien Lynn. The active pall bearers were three grandsons of the deceased, Joseph, Charles and Vernon McCaughey and three nephews, Bernard McQuaid, Melvin McQuaid and Norbert Trainor. Interment took place in the family plot in the church cemetery where services were conducted by Father Butler assisted by Fr. Simpson and Fr. Murnaghan. The funeral of the late Mrs. Garland was largely attended.

"Killed him?" She looked at Roy with horror in her eyes.

"Killed him. Not with his hands; he did nothing the law would call murder. It was worse than that. They were partners in Durban, agents for exporters of South African products in a big way and doing well. My father fell ill—overwork, nervous breakdown; that sort of thing, and everything was left in Borden's hands. Dad was out of the business for nearly three months on his doctor's orders—I was a kid at school at the time and there was nobody else to keep an eye on Borden. He disappeared just when the doctor had pronounced Dad fit to return to harness. He had turned everything he could lay his hands on into money—he had a power of attorney while Dad was helpless—and he went off with the money. My father was ruined—he couldn't even pay his private debts—and when he consulted his lawyer he was told that the power of attorney he had signed was so loosely drawn that it was doubtful if it didn't cover everything Borden had done."

"But hadn't his lawyer seen it before?" Barbara asked.

"No. That was all wrong, of course, but my father was all in when the thing was done—couldn't think, his brain wouldn't work. It seems that's one of the effects of bad nervous breakdowns. Besides, he trusted Borden. Anyhow, he signed what was put before him, and there it was. All the lawyer would say was that, if Dad found Borden and brought him back, there would be a case for the high courts which might be decided in his favour or might not."
