ELLEN'S DIARY

'The Sky-Woman Is Plucking Her Geese!'

"For the Island the snowstorm warning is continued" a radio voice said this morning. "Now that doesn't appear to be too favorable, does it?" James commented. "So," he sighed, reaching out for his cap to be off again to his chores "we may as well get ready for it."

We put away the food, gathered the breakfast dishes to the sink by a window of the kitchen, and surveyed from there sky and field beyond. The morning was a quiet silvery gray. There was without doubt snow in the clouds which came down leadenly to touch the hills.

The prospect of a snowstorm occasions us no uneasiness on our own account. In fact we could thoroughly enjoy one if it were not that always thoughts go out to those who may be ill in the farm - homes, or the wage-earners, the farmers and all who at times must be abroad in it. For living does not end or even rest in a snowstorm. It continues against the increased difficulty.

We saw James carry a bale of bedding to an outpost of stable. We miled. He was already "closing hatches." The younger farmer set the tractor trailer in place before a stable-door. Stalls would be cleaned, the cleanings hauled away to a field to leave everything tidy against whatever stormy spell there might be.

We too must set up our line of defense against its siege. Firewood is our first consideration - and bulwark! For the kitchen stove only, because the cellar holds the stored supply for the furnace.

"Have you no husband?" a farmer queried with a chuckle the other morning when we ferried sticks to the woodbox. "And he suffers you to carry in the wood!"

"Suffers!" we laughed. "Indeed he insists on it - by way of good exercise, he maintains."

"Why, I never thought of it that way" he said stopping a moment to consider it. "It's no use" he commented. "I can't put my wife at that - we burn oil!"

And James came by then. "You'll have to encourage her to take so many paces around the deck" he chuckled. "Though" he nodded, "there's nothing better than a bit of work thrown in with it too."

The afternoon... then it was we saw the snowflakes fall into the gray. We saw the children's idle swing catch them, and in the branches above, the robin's empty nest was being tenderly enfolded in white. Flakes embroidered the youngsters' jackets when they came by on foot from school.

"Did you ever walk home from school through a snowfall?" one asked. "A hundred times!" we replied. "And loved it when the big flakes were gently falling as now. Don't you know? We used to say, 'The Sky - Woman is plucking her geese!'"

Show then, a silent now, sharp against the window. "Shall we make a new rule of life from tonight: always try
