ELLEN'S DIARY

Fond Memories Linger About A Mother's Home

Memories - these, her children gathered in this our childhood home tonight, have now of the mother who was laid to rest this afternoon in the cemetery beyond the village close by and up the road, where resting also, come before her to these earthy dwellings, are the husband, son and grandson, she through the years loved well.

Chosen in the long ago by pioneers who would rest their departed ones well, it is a pretty spot - this one of God's Acres. Set against a gentle slope, a reach of fields, extend above. And over the meadows below, its waters changing to match the varied moods of the winds and weathers of the seasons, a tidal river ebbs and flows to and from the Strait. And today, though the winter could afford no songbirds to sing her requiem, but gave the sun, brilliant in a clear blue sky, and brought the sigh of the wind up from the lightly snow - spread meadows, it was, we thought, a serene and tranquil place, wherein set against "that day" when trysts will be met, one would be well content to leave their loved dead.

Death came to the small and aged mother of this house in a dream on her pillow. Blessed with good health, active all up to the years, her last days seemed to be but a ripening, a final touch of the sun on the gold of the harvest - wheat before it comes up to the reaping.

So memories we have tonight, and forever, we who have known her favors through the years. And our best? Truly, the blithe spirit and happy smile that always welcomed us home. But other memories crowd to mind, her love of blossoms and plants and trees; her exceptional gift of artistry not with brush and canvas, but as revealed in the shades of her handicraft, and in the choice of colors in her rooms. We thank her for stressing the value of orderliness about, for teaching us to put duty before pleasure, and to recognize, while still young, the privilege and blessing of "the common task."

For us, her spirit will ever walk these rooms. Perhaps not
