Women's Institute Has Active Branch In Yukon

How many know we have an active branch of the Women's Institute in Yukon? This is the Haines Junction W.I. with the rather picturesque address of Mile 101B, Whitehorse, N.W.T. I like this statement of the secretary who sent in the story. "We decided we wanted to form some type of Women's group. After studying a few we decided on the Women's Institute, as we liked its aims and objects."

The word "active" in relation to this branch, is used advisedly. Formed a little over two years ago, January 1957, members have rolled up an impressive record since that time. Here are some highlights.

Following a talk, "Gardening in the Yukon", by the Agronomist connected with the Experimental Farm, members began to make gardens. "Quite a feat in the north", says the secretary, Mrs. Hough. An opening meeting was arranged with a speaker on "Education for the Yukon." Community interest was sparked, a new school applied for to the Commissioner in that area, with the result it has now been built. A library has been started from proceeds of catering to a wedding. Much labour, material and books have been donated, when it was found out the women meant business.

For fun they organized a Ladies Curling Bonspiel both winters, with six teams composed of all local women taking part. A play "Frontier Females" was put on. "The audience", to quote again from Mrs. Hough's letter, "were amused with the rugged ways of female hunting". A "Sourdough Shindie" was organized to celebrate Yukon's Jubilee Anniversary, with the refreshments home baked bread and sourdough stove. Proceeds bought a propane stove for the Community Hall, which has been redecorated with new drapes and gingham cloths made for the many tea tables. Quilt material was given the branch and this is being made up, "with ten provincial flowers in applique and quilted in maple leaf design."

At the present time this W.I. is serviced by the office in British Columbia, but it is hoped before long other branches will be formed in this area.

Young Married Man Acts As If He Were Single Again

Dear Mary Haworth: I need help desperately. I am 16, my husband 17. Although I was pregnant when we married, he wasn't forced into it; he knew he was free if he wanted to be. Everything was fine until this Spring.

When the weather broke, Pete became restless. He was completing his education at night school, and working days the had never worked before; always had everything done for him—but now neglects his schooling entirely.

All he wants to do is play baseball; or join a group of single fellows "down at the corner"—two blocks away. Weekdays he comes in from his job at 3:30 p.m., drops his lunch pail, never asks if I need anything; and is off to the corner.

LAZY LOAFER AT HOME Saturdays he gets up late, lounges around until 2 p.m., practices with the ball team until 4 p.m., then he's off to the corner, or another ball field. Saturday nights we go to a movie.

Sunday he sleeps until noon (goes to church occasionally), plays ball in the afternoon, goes to the corner, and finally comes home. Often he wants to go bowling or elsewhere with the group, though he knows we can't afford it, as we are saving pennies for a place of our own. We are with his parents now.

Two mornings ago, I was up feeding the baby when his alarm clock woke him for work. I said I'd fix his lunch if he'd finish feeding the baby, but he wouldn't. Later, he wondered why his lunch

As the pivotal wedding in this picture. When he had given your message to Pete, and Pete had gone out, and had come back alone at 11 p.m., with no explanation of where he had been—at that time Pete's dad had a responsibility to call him on the carpet about the trouble.

After all, Pete is only 17, and leaning on his parents for support of his wife and child. So in truth and fact he is still very much his father's son, in respect to his father's authority and leadership. So why doesn't the father behave like a man and a real family head, and conduct a Court of Inquiry into Pete's behavior—as to whether he is or isn't treating you fairly.

In the particular circumstance you are a daughter, of the household, entitled to proper care and consideration, which the household authorities should insure you. Thus, if their son is taking advantage of the situation to give you a hard time, his parents should be first to crack down on him for it.

In tip-toeing around the situation, as if his being married gives him the right to be wrong, without challenge, in neglecting you, they are encouraging him to feel that he is a Little Tin God—which is very bad for him. As I say, he needs a plain talking-to, from somebody who has a dispassionate sense of justice in human relations—to help him get his feet on the ground.

In spending time on the corner, trying to be one of the boys, when his real role in life is already cast—when he is a husband, father, student and worker, who ought to be establishing a home of his own—Pete is getting lost. He is drifting towards becoming nobody and nothing. He can't find happiness or wholeness by turning back to the boyhood he cut short.

He can only win out by going ahead—by investing his whole heart and all his strength in partnership with you. Who can make that clear to him?

As for what you should do—stay with your mother, if she will permit, for the present. Leave the next move up to Pete. You've conceded; but don't crawl to him. Measure, as an emergency measure, get first-hand counsel from the Family Service, in the town through which you write M.H.

Doleful Tune Of Crickets Mingle With Woodland Airs

Crickets play their doleful tunes for us these times replacing the year's first orchestra gone from streamside and swamp. How enchanting that was! Haunting, prettily the dim of a night. Or when the moon silvered its flow or when far stars were mirrored in the stream by the late-bridge as we floated from excursioning on foot or in machine with James, so dear it was. Just to think of it is to see again the new of the

August Ideas from One Cook to Another

Back-to-school-days won't seem quite so dreary for your offspring — if he can look forward to a delicious lunch-box treat like my time-saving Quick Ginger Bars. They're made so easily, with a gingerbread mix and Carnation Evaporated Milk. And thanks to Carnation's double-riceness, they stay moist and delicious in the lunchbox.

QUICK GINGER BARS: Turn contents of 1 package of gingerbread mix into bowl. Add ½ cup undiluted CARNATION EVAPORATED MILK. Stir until well blended. (Mixture will be very thick). Add 1 cup raisins. Pat into buttered 9-inch square pan. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) 15 to 18 minutes. Cool. Cut into bars. Sprinkle with icing sugar.

Does your small fry come home for lunch? He'll really enjoy his meal — and get proper nourishment too — if you use a little imagination in your planning. Convenience foods will let you prepare something really special — so quickly and easily too! Take canned soup for instance. Prepare it with Carnation Evaporated Milk. It will be richer, smoother and more nourishing. That's because Carnation is concentrated to the consistency of heavy cream — it gives a richness not possible with any other form of milk.

SOUP A L'IMAGINATION (Makes 3 or 4 servings)

1 can of any favorite soup (tomato, green pea, celery, etc.)

½ cup undiluted CARNATION EVAPORATED MILK

½ cup water

Combine soup, Carnation and water in saucepan. Heat to just below boiling and serve at once.

For the littlest students, brighten up the soup picture by floating a few croutons on top of each filled soup bowl. To make, toast small bread cubes in oven until crisp.

For teenage appeal, perk up the soup flavor by the addition of a few well-chosen spices. Marjoram or rosemary in tomato soup, dry powdered savory in chicken soup — I'm sure you'll be able to think of many more!

Pass the dessert please! There's no need to run out of ideas for noon-meal desserts, when there's such a wealth of failure-proof Carnation desserts available. One that I recommend highly for children's lunches is Surprise Baked Custard. It's always smooth and creamy — never watery — thanks to double-riceness Carnation. And it helps provide that extra milk nourishment so important for growing children.

(Makes 6 servings)

4 eggs

½ cup granulated sugar

½ teaspoon salt

1 teaspoon vanilla

½ cup water

1 large can undiluted CARNATION EVAPORATED MILK

¼ cup sifted brown sugar, firmly packed

Beat first six ingredients together to mix well. Divide brown sugar among 6 baking dishes; pour in custard. Put dishes in 2½" deep pan; pour hot water around custard dishes. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) for 40 to 45 minutes, until knife inserted in custard comes out clean. Cool; invert on serving dishes. Brown sugar will form a crust.
