

THE SMUGGLER OF ST. JEAN; OR, THE HIDALGO'S WARD. A STORY OF THE SPANISH COAST.

BY SYLVANUS COBB, JR. CHAPTER XVIII.

Just as the sun was sinking behind the crest of the northernmost spur of the Sierra de Penaguilla, Nina made her way unobtrusively from the castle, and proceeded to the old oak in the forest glade, where she found Rafael Bertrand and Juan Bravo in waiting, and with them, as she had anticipated, was Leon Murillo. The latter was the first to address her. He hastened towards her when he saw her approaching, and eagerly asked concerning the welfare of the lady Estelle. He had taken her hand unconsciously, and held it while anxiously awaiting her answer.

'She is safe, Senor,' replied Nina; and as she took the earnest gaze of the hero her heart fluttered, and her eye dropped.

'Are you sure?' he asked. 'Are you sure the danger is passed?'

'I know she has improved, Senor, and her appetite is good.'

'That is enough,' said the Gipsy chief, who had followed Leon in season to hear this latest remark. 'If the poison has been out, and the lady shows the least sign of improvement she is safe.'

'But how long will she be safe?' queried Leon. 'She is said to be an inmate of the Gipsy den.'

'I have a message for you, Senor,' that may rest your mind in that particular, announced Nina. 'My lady bids me to tell you that when she was able to leave San Martin, she should be a homeless wanderer.'

'Nina, what! Leon Murillo has health and strength, exclaimed the youth impatiently. 'Let her come,' interposed Bertrand, who had now joined the group. 'Bear to her from me, Nina, that when she seeks me here, she shall find a safe and comfortable shelter. And you may tell her one thing more: Tell her that the hour in which she seeks me shall be the dawning of a bright or better day. Give her hope of coming peace, and she will improve faster; and be assured that this hope shall not be without strong and deep foundations. Let her come to us. It will be better so.'

'And,' added Juan Bravo, 'tell your lady that the Gipsy chief will be her friend. Had it been for his interest he would have saved the alcaide; but such is his interest no longer. It is for his interest to serve Estelle d'Avilla, and he will do so. You say the lady is improving. That is good. But I can help her to improve more rapidly. In this I shall be an antidote prepared by myself, and I know its virtues. Let her have a few drops of this with her wine whenever she drinks it, and you will mark a wonderful result. Do not fear, for I give you my word that it cannot possibly do harm.'

Nina took the phial, and promised that she would, at least, try the experiment. 'If my word is of any use,' said Leon, as Nina held the phial in her hand, 'you may trust the word of the Gipsy. Be sure that you give the antidote.'

'Nina seemed fully assured by this, for she put the phial away in her bosom as one puts away a precious thing; after which Leon smiled.

'And now will you meet me here to-morrow evening, at this same hour, and bring me intelligence of Lady Estelle's condition?'

Nina promised that she would. 'And in the meantime,' suggested Bertrand, 'you will keep an eye upon the alcaide. Sleep not while he has access to your lady's apartment.'

'Fear not, Senor,' replied the girl. 'My mistress and I can both watch.'

'Then watch and wait,' pursued the smuggler chief; 'and in the end all shall be well. There is an earthquake brewing beneath Don Bernardo's feet, and when the shock comes he shall be most assuredly swallowed up.'

Nina would have stopped longer—she would have asked many questions—but the high day was departing, and she had a long journey home. She went with a new look, however, and her step was light and buoyant; for there was no self-hesitation in her heart. The hope which she held was more for her mistress than for herself, and it gave her joy to carry it. She reached the castle in safety, and entered her lady's chamber just as the stars were beginning to show their lights in the heavens. She lighted a lamp, and first made Estelle take a small portion of the medicine which Juan Bravo had given her; after which she sat down and gave an account of her mission.

'Nina,' spoke Estelle, 'something after the attendant had closed her narrative, 'I know that you love me, and that you will not laugh at me if I ask you a foolish question. I am sad and lonesome—only you to love, and you to care—and my heart goes forth after something more—something strong and reliable—something like what my father was.'

'Sweet lady, you know I could not trust lightly any question from your lips. Ask me what you please.'

'You have seen Leon Murillo?'

'Yes, lady.'

'Then, tell me, Nina—tell me truly—does he love me?'

Estelle rested her hand upon her attendant's bosom as she spoke. Nina would have arms about her neck, and tenderly replied: 'Dear lady, if I possessed a love such as I know Leon Murillo feels for you, all the wealth of the world—aye even life itself—could not purchase it. If he loves you with a love that can never die, then all signs are false, and my own understanding goes for me.'

day, and the dull pain was all gone from her head, and the oppression from her lungs. She drank a little wine, with some of Juan's medicine in it, and shortly afterwards she commenced feeling hungry. Nina went down into the kitchen and prepared breakfast with her own hands, Constanza allowing her to do as she pleased. It was a savory, substantial meal, and Estelle ate with a relish that gave token of rapidly returning health and strength. Nina had just time to clear away the dishes and cover her mistress up, when Don Bernardo made his appearance.

'Does your lady get sleep?' he asked.

'She seems to sleep now, Senor; but she has been awake this morning; and she complained of a new pain—a strange, gnawing sensation at the stomach. Do you think the symptom an alarming one?'

'I cannot tell, Nina. We will wait until the doctor comes.'

'Will he come to-day?'

'I cannot tell. But it matters little. I fear we must have no medicine which can help her. You have some of the old left?'

'Yes, enough to last until to-morrow.'

'Then give that regularly, and if there is no change for the better by to-morrow, I will send for the physician.'

After Don Bernardo had gone, Estelle got up, and walked across the floor. At first Nina assisted her; but she soon wished to try the experiment alone, and she found herself stronger even than she had expected.

'By to-morrow, Nina, I shall be able to leave San Martin. We can steal away under cover of the night.'

'Be not hasty, dear lady. Let us wait until the morrow comes.'

'No,' persisted Estelle. 'We will only wait for this evening to come; and then, if I have improved as I think I shall, you will make arrangements with our friends to be ready to assist me on the evening of to-morrow. Make no objections, Nina, for I am resolved. I cannot remain here longer. If the physician comes again we cannot deceive him. He will feel my pulse, and he will find it strong and full.'

'I think he will be here to-morrow morning, if not to-day,' said Nina; 'but we will find some means of deceiving him. Rest easy, and let us hope for the best. Things have worked well thus far, and I do not believe they will turn against us.'

'I trust not, Nina. If we can blind the physician all may be well.'

During the day Estelle's strength of nerve increased, and when evening came she declared that she felt almost as strong as ever. When the sun had touched the top of the mountain Nina glided forth upon her mission to the old oak where she found Leon Murillo and Juan Bravo. Bertrand was engaged elsewhere. It was a strange sight to see those two men thus friendly to each other; but Nina knew something of the erratic disposition of the Zucali when self-interest was concerned, so she did not wonder.

Leon was overjoyed when he learned of Estelle's improvement, and a murmur of thanks to God dropped from his lips when Nina told him that her mistress would probably leave the castle on the evening of the next day.

'She will come to-morrow?'

'Yes, Senor, and she will trust herself in your care. If she can contrive to deceive the physician to-morrow morning all may be well; but she fears that when he feels her pulse, he will detect the vigorous flow of blood.'

'Nothing can be more easy than to hide that,' said Juan Bravo. 'I will show you a simple method by which the flow of blood in the arteries of the wrist may be entirely suspended. Be not alarmed. I shall not harm you. Now place your finger upon your wrist. Can you feel the pulse?'

'Yes.'

'Then Juan Bravo pressed his finger upon the point where the subclavian artery passes near to the surface, in the hollow just above the collar bone.'

'What do you feel now?' he asked.

'I feel nothing.'

'Your pulse has entirely stopped, eh?'

'Yes.'

'And do you notice where I press my finger?'

'Yes.'

'That mark me: All the blood that circulates through the arteries where the physicians find their pulse, must pass this point, and a moderate pressure, you see, will stop the current. Let the lady practice until she can be sure of the point, and her doctor may be utterly deceived. You will remember?'

'Yes, replied Nina, regarding the Gipsy with a feeling akin to awe, for to her there was something wonderful in the lesson she had been taught.

'And now,' said Leon, who saw that the girl was anxious to be going, 'let us understand how we are next to meet. I will be here to-morrow evening with horses and a pair of mules, and you shall be borne at once to a place of safety. I will meet her here, or I will meet her nearer to the castle.'

'Let it be here, Senor. Should you go nearer, some of the woodmen might discover you. I will assist my lady to this point.'

'Very well. I will be here; and Captain Bertrand shall be here with me. If your lady cannot come, she will be sure to come and report.'

Nina promised that she would, and shortly afterwards she turned back towards the castle. She found Estelle sitting by one of the windows, and when she had reported the result of her mission, they went to experimenting upon Juan Bravo's lesson, and ere long the secret was fully mastered.

On the following morning, at an early hour, the physician came, and with him came Don Bernardo.

'How is your lady this morning?' asked the doctor, as he approached the bed.

'Alas!' replied Nina, with well feigned sorrow, 'I dare not say.'

'Does she grow weaker?'

'I fear so, Senor.'

The physician took a seat by the bedside, and reached after the patient's wrist. Estelle's face was shaded, and her fingers were pressed upon the large artery which supplied the arm that the doctor had taken. For a full minute he searched in vain for the pulse. Finally he said, with a double shake of the head:

'She is much weaker—much weaker.'

'He left her more medicine, and when he had passed out into the hall, he stopped and spoke with the alcaide.

'Senor, your fair ward is dying. I doubt if she lives through the day. If there is any business which needs her attention, you had better present it to her this afternoon.'

'I will do so, doctor. But tell me: Can you fully comprehend the nature of her disease?'

'I am free to confess that I cannot, Senor. There are diseases the springs of which lie beyond the power of human ken, and this is one of them. I can only determine that it is a sudden and swift consuming of the vitality; but what has caused it I cannot tell.'

'But you think she is dying?'

'I am sure of it.'

'And sorry; but if the Lord so will, it so must be.'

The physician returned on his way to

Donia, and towards the middle of the forenoon the alcaide followed him.

'When Estelle is out of the way,' the Hidalgo muttered to himself, as he rode slowly out from the court, 'I must turn my attention to others. Pepin and Michael Ferrara must be found; and Leon Murillo and Rafael Bertrand need my attention. Inferno! I would like to know where Juan Bravo is. I fear the villain is playing me false. He is wrathful because I gave not Leon Murillo up to him as I had promised. But he cannot do me harm. If he dares attempt it, I will lead the whole military force of Denia against him, and sweep him and his rascally band from the face of the earth.'

While the alcaide was thus riding away, Estelle was up and dressed, feeling most as strong and well as ever. She had eaten a hearty breakfast, she ate a hearty dinner; and when evening came she was prepared to flee from the castle. Her jewels and money were safely packed, and Nina made up a bundle of her clothing as was indispensably necessary. Late in the afternoon Don Bernardo's step was heard in the hall, and Estelle quickly sought her bed, while her companion darkened the windows.

'Hush!' whispered Nina, placing her finger upon her lips as the alcaide entered. 'I think my lady sleeps. She cannot bear disturbance. If you would see her again alive, you had better gaze upon her now.'

'Never mind. I will retire to my own apartments, and when you think she is dying you may call me.'

The shades of night at length fell over hill and forest, and Estelle and Nina glided noiselessly out from the domicile, leaving the court by the postern, and gaining the garden beyond without having been detected. They were moving on towards the forest when the sound of a footfall caused them to stop, and in a moment more they heard a voice demanding:

'Who goes there?'

As quickly as possible they darted into a thicket of oleanders, and shortly afterwards a man passed close by them muttering very plainly:

'Padre Santo! they were women I am sure. Some thieving Gitanas prowling round. I'll have a watch set.'

'It is Francisco Alvarez,' whispered Nina, after the man had passed on. 'But come—he is gone now. He is too much of a coward to stop at night where he thinks a Gipsy is lurking.'

The girls emerged from their hiding place, and ere long gained the forest path, where Nina asked Estelle to lean upon her arm.

'No, no, Nina, I am strong and well. The thought of freedom from that wicked man's power is to me a medicine. He is welcome to my wealth, since I exchange it for a happier home.'
