PRESS INTERVIEWING.

HOW PROMINENT CANADIAN PUBLIC MEN RECEIVE REPORTERS.

The Man of Intellect is Always Gentlemanly, But the Cad is Always the Bane of the Reporter's Life—A Request for an Interview is a Weighty Compliment.

"When you want anything go straight to the fountain head. Don't ever make a request on a matter of importance to an underling."

These words were addressed to me several years ago by a city editor who knew his business. I have interviewed a goodly number of men since and have come to the conclusion that his advice was sound.

I have found that in most instances where an interview is requested from a man who has but recently sprang into prominence, or where he holds a subordinate position, or where he is ignorant, it is extremely difficult to accomplish your object. In the first instance the individual is so full of his own importance that he usually considers that it would be beneath his dignity to grant an interview. In the second case he may be quite in sympathy with you, but afraid of saying anything which might not accord with the views of his chief, and in the last instance you are likely to find the subject so suspicious that you are attempting to take advantage of him that your real object, namely, to secure his opinion, will be frustrated.

The thoroughly well educated gentleman in any walk of life is the ideal subject for an interview. He is easy of access, in case you have good grounds for meeting him; he believes you honest until such time as you have given him cause to think otherwise; he listens to you, and immediately grants you the interview, or refuses, stating his reasons, and he always treats you with the utmost courtesy. There are men who, when asked by a reporter to grant an interview, appear to think that the granting of the request places both the reporter and the journal he represents under a great obligation to him, forgetting all the while that he has been paid a great compliment, inasmuch as the newspaper offers to publish his views to the world at the sacrifice of other important items of news.

Courteous Wilfrid Laurier.

Perhaps the most pleasing duty to which I was ever assigned, in the interviewing line, was that which secured me an introduction to Hon. Wilfrid Laurier. I was detailed to ask him a series of questions bearing upon the policy of the Reform party. I found him at the house of a friend in Toronto and made known my mission. I was at once admitted to the presence of the great leader of the Reform party. He was sitting alone in the library writing. Immediately I entered the room he arose and extended his hand in friendly greeting.

"Are you visiting me as Koko, my young friend, or as an Empire reporter?" he said, as he graciously motioned me to a chair.

I replied that I approached him in a dual capacity. He laughed and thoroughly appreciated the situation then he replied:

"I am most pleased to see you as Koko, but since I have nothing at the present time to say to the public through the public prints, I must refuse to meet the reporter."

Then he began to talk about the very subjects I had been detailed to interview him upon in such a manner as to rivet my attention. I had heard him many times in the House and had admired the brilliancy of his oratory, but never before had I found myself under the magic spell of his overpowering personality. He was frank, plausible and apparently confidential. When he touched upon a particular subject, at that time exercising the public mind, his eyes became brilliant, his face flushed and his voice became particularly clear and musical. When I rose to depart he again shook hands and requested me to call upon him at Ottawa, but did not caution me not to publish the conversation just passed. I failed in my object. I did not secure an interview for my paper, but I gained a sincere respect for the man.

Sir John Macdonald.

Sir John A. Macdonald was an interviewer's delight. He would meet you at all times even though he was—and he always was—pressed with business of importance. He never seemed in a hurry. The reporters were always welcome, whether on a Conservative or Reform paper. He would usually begin by speaking about some important incident of the day. After you had stated the object of your visit he would reply at once and say whether or not he would grant the interview for publication. I know of cases where he would grant the interview, but request that it should not be published before a certain date in the future. He always seemed interested in young men. I never met him but what he enquired as to my health, how I was getting along, how the different members of my family were, and always concluded with a word of encouragement.

Patient Sir Oliver.

Sir Oliver Mowat has the reputation of being a dyed-in-the-wool Tory. He is considered by many who know him intimately to be one of the most conservative of men, and yet in the matter of granting an interview he is perhaps one of the most accessible in Canada. I have never yet left him after an interview without a feeling that the predominant feature of his nature is kindness. If he grants an interview for publication—which is rare in the case of Conservative journals—he does not begin by giving elaborate instructions. He says what he wants to and trusts implicitly to the reporter to do him justice. He seldom refuses point blank to grant an interview, but has an exasperating habit of telling you after you have had your interview that

"Of course I have not said a word for publication."

I have observed him keenly during the session, when he almost daily receives deputations soliciting Government aid for various projects. No matter how long the spokesman talks, or no matter what twaddle he may omit, the Attorney-General appears interested, and never for a moment allows the impression that he is bored to circulate.

His usual answer is simply, "We will take the matter into our serious consideration," and usually that is the last heard of the affair. There are times, however, when he evinces great interest in what is said, and while he is always guarded in his replies, I have known him to say off-hand that he was much impressed and that aid would be granted to this or that scheme under consideration.

The Premier's Style.

Sir John Thompson has the power to put his ideas into fewer words than any other man I know. He wastes no time on formalities. If you have business with him he will see you, no matter what paper you represent. He does not make flesh of one and flesh of another. You are expected to state as briefly as possible your business, and on the instant you will receive your reply. Like all men of powerful minds he seems to have thought out beforehand any question you might chance to ask him. He takes your word every time, but somehow you leave him with the impression that it would a terrible mistake to ever deceive him. He usually stands during an interview. Invariably he shakes hands before you begin. He asks no questions. After you have stated your case he gives you your answer, and in most cases asks you to repeat your notes that he may be sure that you have correctly caught his idea. That is all. He bids you a pleasant good-day, and is ready for the next of many callers.

A Pleasant Man is Mr. Meredith.

Mr. W. R. Meredith is a man who puts heart into a reporter the moment he shakes hands. He inspires you at once with the idea that he is a noble gentleman, who thoroughly understands your anxiety and intends doing all he can to assist you. If he has anything to say he talks freely, and pays you the compliment of forgetting to caution you to be sure and publish his exact words. If he has nothing to say he will treat you kindly, and usually talks for a few moments on some topic of the day. The press men in the gallery, whether on Conservative or Reform journals, all admire him as a man and make special efforts to see that he is correctly reported.

About the hardest men to interview are railway officials, especially after an accident. None of them know anything, won't know anything, and try, so far as in their power, to prevent you knowing anything about the affair. They don't appear to be able to grasp the idea that all the particulars are bound to come out, and that the very fact that they refuse to give them stimulates the reporter to increased effort. In many cases the railroad officials could, by giving the facts to the reporters, save themselves and the newspapers a great deal of trouble and annoyance. In every railway accident, where any people are injured, their friends or relatives are anxious to obtain particulars. In cases where the officials refuse to give them, very often the reporters, who are anxious to obtain facts, only secure data of an erroneous character from outsiders, and, as a consequence, a great deal of annoyance ensues.

The chief requisite in a successful interviewer is a thorough knowledge of his subject before he approaches the person from whom he desires to draw opinions.—Koko, in The Empire.

When the Queen Was Young.

The marriage of Queen Victoria, then only 20 years of age, to Prince Albert of Saxe Gotha was, it is well known, a veritable love match, but for some years the royal lady found some difficulty in reconciling her sense of dignity and her wifely affection. The story goes that one day after a little disagreement. Her Majesty having expressed herself in rather a despotic tone, the Prince, whose manly self-respect was smarting at her words, sought the seclusion of his own apartments, closing and locking the door after him.

In about five minutes someone knocked at his door.

"Who is it?" inquired the Prince.

"It is I. Open to the Queen of England!" haughtily responded Her Majesty.

There was no reply. After a long interval there came a gentle tapping and the low spoken words:

"It is I, Victoria, your wife!"

And then the door was opened, and the young bride was clasped in her husband's arms.

The Pretty Widows.

The black-eyed widow looked unusually meditative, and one of the other widows offered her a penny for her thoughts.

"I was pondering," she said, "a remark that a bachelor made to me this morning, and wondering whether to accept it as consolatory or the contrary."

"What was the remark?" asked the other widows with one voice. "Well," the black-eyed widow continued, "a theatre party was made up in our house last night, and at breakfast the bachelor asked me why I was not of it. I replied that I was not invited—that I feared that I was no longer attractive, and suspected myself to be passed.

"The bachelor seized my hand respectfully, turned me gently toward the light, inspected me curiously, and then exclaimed in a solemn tone. "Madam, go upstairs and thank your maker!"

"The horrid thing!" cried all the other widows in a breath. "What on earth did he mean?"

Gladstone's First Speech.

Mr. Labouchere has come into possession of a photograph of a sketch of Mr. Gladstone making his first great speech in the House of Commons in 1833. The sketch, which is said to have been drawn at the time, represents Mr. Gladstone, then a member for Newark, speaking from the front bench below the gangway in the old house that was burned down the next year. Mr Gladstone's very first utterance in the House of Commons was made, not from the front bench below the gangway, but from under the gallery, where he was almost inaudible to reporters; and, curiously enough, it was in reply to Rigby Wasen, then member for Ipswich, and father of Mr. Eugene Wason, who now represents South Ayrshire as one of Mr. Gladstone's staunchest supporters.

Before Columbus.

The belief in a Chinese Columbus was first allowed by scholars only about fifty years ago. The claim is that a Buddhist priest in the fifth century crossed the Pacific to this continent and returned, making a written report of his dicovery. The report still exists. It was translated into French in 1791 by M. deGuignes. It gives a narrative of a voyage eastward by a priest for 20,000 li, where he found a country which he named Fusang. People similar to the Indians were described, as well as American plants. The only doubt about the matter is as to the distance meant by 20,000 li. The priest may have reached only some island in the Pacific Ocean.
