CHAPTER XXVII Continued

Rutledge raised his eyes in the most intense surprise, his heart thrilling with a pleasure so keen it was almost pain. Surely it could not be—yes, it was—Verlie.

The meeting with Rutledge was quite as much of a surprise and shock to Verlie. She was the first to recover her composure, however.

"Is it possible you did not know Mr Chester is a relative of mine—by marriage?" she asked, turning to the astonished captain, when the greeting was over. "The young wife whom he lost by death nearly two years ago was my beloved sister Uldene."

At that moment much to the captain's infinite annoyance, Mrs. Renwick, his hostess, came up to claim him. "I shall not leave you, until you have promised me a waltz," he said to Verlie, anticipating that that was the very favor Rutledge had intended to ask.

"I have just one waltz left," said Verlie smiling, "I shall be pleased to give it to you." And that smile quite disturbed Rutledge Chester.

Both gentlemen gazed for one instant into that bewitching girlish face, and they looked at each other sharply. The captain bowed and turned away, and much against his will, followed his hostess from the spot.

"Verlie," said Rutledge, when he found himself alone with her, "will you come to the conservatory? I have so much to say to you—so much to talk to you about."

She placed her little hand on his arm, but he did not notice how that little gloved hand trembled. He did not know the valiant effort she made to still the loud throbbing of her heart.

Verlie had told herself long since that she had forgotten him; that the love that once filled her heart for him had died out; but now, as she stood face to face with him again, she realized that her love for him was still warm in her heart, and the knowledge made poor Verlie doubly shy with him.

As they stood among the flowers in the conservatory, listening to the splash of the perfumed water of the fountain, they talked of Uldene. It was a great surprise to Rutledge to hear that Verlie had never ceased writing each week to Uldene's old address, but the letters had never been answered.

How was he to know that beautiful, guilty Uldene had always torn these letters up, that the Seftons might lose all trace of her?

That half hour by the fountain neither of them ever forgot in all the long years of bitter pain and sorrow that followed.

They both returned to the ball-room with a new, strange thrill in their hearts. The captain came up at once to claim Verlie for the waltz she had promised him, and away they floated together to the dreamy measures of the sweet dance music.

The captain quite thought it was the pretty compliments he was paying her; that brought that unusual flush to her cheeks and the unwonted sparkle to her bright blue eyes. How was he to know that she was recalling every look that had crossed Rutledge Chester's handsome face as they stood together by the fountain, and every word he had uttered?

"They make a very handsome couple—Verlie and the Captain," whispered

What love can compare with the tender self-sacrificing spirit of the weary, watch-worn mother by the side of her suffering little one? Such mothers take little or no account of their own weariness and weakness, but keep on until they drop. They seldom realize how completely their baby's health depends upon their own.

Every mother, and every woman who expects to be a mother, ought to obtain the health-bringing, strength-creating assistance of Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. It gives elastic endurance to the organs concerned in motherhood, and nourishing vitality to the special nerve-centers.

Taken early during gestation, it makes motherhood perfectly safe and almost painless. Its beneficial effect is transmitted to the child in increased constitutional vigor. It protects the mother against relapse and improves the quantity and quality of nourishment during the nursing period.

It reinforces tired over-wrought women at every critical stage, and heals the special diseases to which they are subject. It was designed for this express purpose by an educated physician and skilled specialist.

Dr. Pierce has devoted thirty years to this particular field of practice. His thousand-page book, the "People's Medical Adviser," will be sent free, for 31 one-cent stamps to pay the cost of customs and mailing only. Or, cloth-bound for 50 stamps. Address, R. V. Pierce, M. D., Buffalo, N. Y.

his hostess, contentedly. "I should not wonder if it would end in a match."

The careless words pierced Rutledge Chester's heart like the throb of a keen blade. The carelessly spoken words brought a strange, troubled thought to his heart. If the captain won Verlie Sefton for his bride, all the light and brightness of this world would be over for him.

He had often persuaded himself into the belief that it had been simply admiration that had filled his heart in that never-to-be-forgotten past for sweet, golden-haired Verlie; and that the love of his life had been given to Uldene, and his heart lay buried in her grave.

But that sweet, sad love-story, was of the beautiful past. Now it came to him with a sudden shock that, even as the branch may blossom twice, so love may bloom again—an oasis in a desert life; a heart may yield for a second time to the magic witchery of love's sweet dream.

That night, late as it was after the ball, Verlie found time to write a few lines home. The closing words of the hastily written letter were these:

"This ball was the most enjoyable of all, mother, dear. There was a longing in my heart that it might last forever. I must not forget to tell you a great surprise. Rutledge returned, two weeks ago, from Europe. We met at the ball to-night. He is the same Rutledge as of yore—a trifle graver and sadder, perhaps."

When Nella Sefton read those words she knew why Verlie had enjoyed the ball so much.

From the night of the ball Rutledge became a daily visitor at the Renwick villa, much to the alarm of Captain Lansing, and the rest of the train of Verlie's admirers.

A sudden coolness sprang up between Rutledge and the captain. When one called, he was pretty certain to find the other there. There was something more than brotherly devotion in all this; the captain told himself, angrily, and he even went so far as to boldly hint to Rutledge:

"It was a wonder he had not selected Verlie in the first place, instead of her dark-eyed sister, Uldene."

Rutledge was strongly tempted to tell him that he had done so; but out of respect to poor Uldene he would not reveal how his marriage to her had come about.

"If I were a suitor for her hand, and the young lady herself does not object, I do not see why any one else should," Rutledge had retorted, hotly.

From that hour these two, who had been life-long friends, became bitter rivals—enemies.

"I promise you I shall use every means in my power to prevent you from winning her," retorted the captain. "You take advantage of your position in the family to influence her against me; but it will avail you little. I shall win her in spite of you, if I may be allowed the use of the term."

"It has been said that 'all is fair in love and war,'" said Rutledge, quietly. "I, too, am equally determined to make Miss Sefton my bride. Words are useless; it simply remains to see which of us she prefers."

They parted in the bitterest anger. Never, in this world, were two lovers more desperately determined to fight hard for a fair lady's favor.

As for Verlie herself, try as hard as she would to prevent her thoughts from clustering around Rutledge Chester, they would fly to him unbidden; waking or dreaming, his face was always before her—this handsome, kindly hero, whom she had loved in secret so long. But as she grew to love him more and more as the days rolled by, she avoided him, lest he should read her secret in her eyes, by their glad welcome, or in the tell-tale blushes that rose to her cheeks as she greeted him.

"He could never love me," she often told herself, piteously; "he thinks of me only as Uldene's sister—beautiful Uldene, whom he loved and lost. Once before I mistook friendly liking for love; I shall not make the same mistake again."

Verlie's avoidance of him was a strange puzzle to Rutledge. There were times when he thought she cared for him; and then again, when he was most hopeful, her apparent coldness would drive him to despair.

At length the mad love in his heart would brook no delay. The fierce rivalry between Captain Lansing and himself must come to an end, he told himself.

Verlie's visit was drawing to a close. On the following week she was to return to Richmond, and each determined on the ensuing week to learn his fate.

Rutledge Chester declared he should win her or die; the captain vowed the same thing.

CHAPTER XXVII

EVERY HEART FINDS ITS TRUE MATE SOME TIME IN LIFE.

The round of festivities of the season were to end in a lawn fete at the villa, and on this occasion Rutledge told himself he should learn his fate.

As he entered the grounds, ablaze with electric lights, and the flaming colored lanterns, the first person whom he met was the captain, who brushed past him with the coldest nod courtesy would allow, and Rutledge could tell by his face that this was to be a remembered evening in the captain's life as well.

Each felt certain the other would ask Verlie to be his wife ere the evening was over, and both watched desperately for the first opportunity.

How sweetly fair Verlie looked in her simple white muslin dress, her golden curls caught girlishly back by a knot of blue ribbon, with no ornaments save the cluster of forget-me-nots she wore on her breast.

As Verlie was busy receiving her guests with her hostess, it was quite an hour before the captain could put the plan he had mapped out into execution, but at length fate favored him. He found Verlie alone for a moment.

"Shall we make a tour of the grounds, Miss Sefton?" he asked. "I have something particular to say to you."

"No thought of what he had to say crossed Verlie's mind as she consented. She talked gaily enough in her gay, happy, girlish way as he led her away from the fragrant blooms. Suddenly it occurred to her that her companion was constrainedly silent.

"I do not believe you have heard a word I have said, Captain Lansing," she said, demurely. "I think I shall find you another companion—one who can chase away those dark shadows from your face."

Weak and Run Down, With Heart and Kidneys in Bad Condition—Restored by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

"I was very much run down, having been sick for several months. I had been trying different remedies which did me no good. I would have severe spells of coughing that would leave me prostrate. I was told that my lungs were affected, and my heart and kidneys were in a bad condition. In fact, it seemed as though every organ was out of order. I felt that something must be done and my brother advised me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. I procured a bottle and began taking it. Before it was half gone I felt that it was helping me. I continued its use and it has made me a new woman. I cannot praise it too highly." MRS. SUMMERVILLE, 217 Ossington Avenue, Toronto, Ontario. Get only Hood's, because
