Lines on the Death of an Infant.

Gone, but not dead; removed from sight, But happier by far Than had it lived to face the fight With many a doubt and scar.

Gone, but not lost; removed to where All wanderings are unknown, Where parting pangs, discord and care Shall ne'er call forth a moan.

Gone, never to return; but oh, What comfort doth it bring,— Gone where each one can surely go: Sweet balm for every sting.

Gone where no mother's voice will quell Each little childish wail, For there no fears nor ills can dwell To mar the peaceful vale.

Gone from a loving father's eyes, But better far to be With Him who called it from the skies To immortality.

Yes, gone, but do not mourn a loss Wherein is so much gain:
'Tis better thus to shun the cross With all its toil and pain.

Gone, but why grieve to see it go Where we all wish to rest; Would we prefer this life of woe To Jesus' loving breast?

Gone, without any sad regret Or melancholy doubt,
Its little sun has calmly set,
Its feeble flame gone out.

Gone in its childish purity;
A lamb without a stain, A blossom plucked from off the tree Ere beaten by the rain.

Yes, gone, to join a purer throng And share a Saviour's love; Then let us thank Him who, ere long, Shall join us all above.

J. B. DOCKENDORFF.
Southport, P. E. I.

Notes from Rustico.

"The storm is changed into a calm, At His command and will,
So that the waves which raged before, Now quiet are and still."

Thus soliloquized the monarch minstrel of old, as in pious recognition of the majesty of Omnipotence, he regarded the peaceful termination of ocean's destructive rage; and so respond we in our souls to-day as we look forth, in the fair morning glory, upon the now unruffled surface of a lately boisterous sea; that sea which through the ages has hymned her Creator's praise, or wailed in piteous strains, the fitting requiem of derived greatness. The late storm has drifted into the bay a large quantity of seaweed, which comes as a precious boon to the near-by farmers, who are actively taking advantage of the opportunity afforded them to secure both a cheap and a most serviceable fertilizer. On the other side those gleaming waters, in the world-vanquished "home of the brave and the free," descendants of those brave men who fought and conquered on many a bloody field to build up England's greatness, are employed in like manner; and yet unlike, in this respect, that the farmer here cut off the seaweed, whilst many of their unfortunate brethren across the Atlantic are fain to carry their burdens upon their own back.
The mass of our agriculturists may not be able to accumulate wealth, but they have at least the comforting assurance that the baneful curse of landlordism cannot rob them of the soil which their industry has enriched; and even should a partial failure in the crops discomfit them for the time being, there looms up before them no heart-rending prospect of starvation, rack-renting or eviction. But we turn from this painful contemplation in the well-grounded hope that the quickly coming day will arrive when retribution and re-adjustment will overtake the wrongs of time.

Very pleasant has been our sojourn upon the northern borders of our Island home, with her beautiful outlook upon the mighty ocean, where glint in the golden rays of a fervent sun, the white sails of the largest fishing fleet on P. E. Island; the expansive view over the further shores of Tracadie, Brackley Point and Covehead, and the near-by harbor with its warning light, and its sheltering breakwater. One pleasant memory will be of a visit to the Seaside Hotel, where we were entertained in first-class style by the lady hostess, Mrs.
Newson. The foreign element is more noticeable in this hotel than in the other country resorts, probably because of the higher rates; but for those who desire and can afford the luxuries of life, the Seaside provides a most charming summer retreat.

"Sorrowful yet rejoicing," a phrase difficult of comprehension, arose in all its sublimity of beauty before our mental vision upon meeting at his residence, the Rev. R.
P. McPhee, parish priest of Rustico, which parish, we are informed, is the second largest in the Province. Highly respected by outsiders, and deeply beloved by his immediate charge amongst whom he has labored so zealously and so unremittently for the last nineteen years, his state of health is a source of much uneasiness to his flock, and of no small amount of suffering to himself. Nevertheless, the patient servant works and waits, trusting that when the Master's time is ripe, the promised reward will surely come. The Convent is a fine building, and the Chapel a gem in its rural setting.

The Cavendish district, with its smiling homesteads and its little church, surrounded by the white monuments of the peaceful sleepers, looks well. On our way thither we passed a happy group, consisting of the fine children of Dr. Taylor, who, with their faithful nurse, are spending the summer in this locality, and we remarked on passant, that it argues well both for the employer and the employed, when young children can thus be trusted with an hip-ping. Approaching from the Cavendish side the view which opens up along the New London shore is simply magnificent in its long stretch of yellow sand, sloping up into the vivid green of the gently rising hills. At Stanley Bridge we dined, and spent a short time at the hospitable dwelling of Dr. McNeill, the deservedly popular medical adviser of New London.

In these days of the legalized "quack" it is refreshing to meet with honesty and ability in a profession which teems with counterfeits; and, from all accounts, Dr.
McNeill, realizing his responsibility, acts to the satisfaction of his own conscience, and as aware of the oversight of heaven.
At Cape La Force, near Cavendish, was wrecked the fast sailing bark Marco Polo, whose record for speed has never been equalled amongst sailing vessels. One of her huge timbers, bearing the tonnage number of 1150, washed ashore in front of our present residence, forms a pleasant rendezvous, and a constant reminder of the perils of the deep.

Lowering clouds hastened the return from Stanley Bridge, and prevented our intended visit to Hope River, the birthplace of two men destined to figure in the annals of their country, one as erstwhile Governor of the great Northwest, and the other as a statesman of abilities unsurpassed in the wide Dominion of Canada. Little did the youthful neighbors dream, as in boyish glee they ran about the braes, or waded in the rippling waters, that the years would fetch them the highest honors in the gift of the British crown. Turning our faces Rustico-ward, we think of that other distinguished Islander who so gracefully wears the mitre bestowed upon him by the earthly Head of his Church, and whose attainments in literature have reflected splendor upon his early home.

To natives of a mountain-land, our inland scenery, though pleasing in its changing aspect of cultured farm and many-hued forests, may seem somewhat tame; but not so our Island coast in its endless variation of promontory and bay; bold, rugged headlands which bound the angry breakers, or long stretches of almost level shore, where the tiny wavelets flash in the sunlight as they dance across the furrowed said to the music of a summer sea. It is with feelings of regret that we must soon bid adieu to our kindly hostess, our genial host, whose powers of oratory in a righteous cause are worthy of highest eulogium, and would certainly do no discredit to a public platform, and to the pleasant sphere in which we have so enjoyably passed the last few days—Rustico—the beautiful, soul-refreshing, health-inspiring Rustico.
