hands who happened to be walking, tumbled under cover in a mad dash to escape a ducking in the icy sea.

It might be a matter of minutes before safe ice was again encountered, but everyone aboard was tense with excitement. The captain and crew could recall the many times when things did not work out so well. They had seen men drown, and they had seen others badly frozen; but it was all a part of the tough life they chose to follow.

Now the iceboat makes good headway, gliding smoothly and gracefully on her way. A moment more, and there is trouble ahead. A small iceberg drifts across their path.

"Ho, there!" shouts the captain. "There she is!" "To the right!" "Good work boys!"

Now they are back on solid footing. Away they fly! Safely past the threatened danger. Farther on, a narrow ribbon of a crevice opens suddenly in front of them. As the ship lunges into this abyss the flying spray falls and freezes on their faces, blinding their vision.

"Paddles!" roars the captain. "Force her forward boys! . . . Ha, we are off again! that we are mates."

The passengers, growing impatient, murmur among themselves. "Courage, my good people!" soothes the skipper. This may go on for hours, even all night.

There you have it, reader. A picture of an ice boat with crew and passengers crossing the Strait in pioneer days.

Out this out to remind you or to pass on to another sufferer.

NOWELL — SMITH WEDDING

A very pretty wedding took place on November 26, 1929, in the First Congregational Church, Somerville, Mass.

The bride was the former Miss Jennie E. Smith, who taught school in Ellerslie. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Smith of Victoria, B.C.

The groom, Ralph E. Nowell, lives in Lexington, Mass., where he has his own Bicycle business.

The bride wore a white satin brocade gown and a fingertip length veil with a coronet of pearls. She carried a bouquet of white roses and gardenias with a center corsage of a large white orchid.

The bride was given in marriage by her uncle, Mr. John E. Moore. The bridesmaid, a cousin, Luella McLaurin, wore a gold velvet gown with a green satin picture hat and carried a bouquet of gold chrysanthemums. The best man was Archie McLaurin, also a cousin of the bride.

The reception was held in the church parlors immediately after the ceremony, and was attended by many relatives and friends of the bride and groom.

The happy couple flew to New York City, where they spent their honeymoon.

Their many friends wish them every good fortune and happiness in their married life together.

Dorothy Dix Says

Continued from page 2 pompous and self-conceited and make every one with whom they come in contact feel as if they were morons. A woman need not even be a good conversationalist to have people enjoy her society. She need only be a patient listener.

Any woman can learn how to do things. She can learn how to dance, how to play games, how to play a good game of contract. Thus will she be assured of a welcome wherever she goes for the woman we dread is the one who is a sort of a bull in the social china shop and who always smashes everybody's plans and arrangements.

Any woman can learn how to do and say the right things. Doing the right thing is merely taking a little trouble and using a few lobes of your brains. It is writing a note of thanks for courtesies received. It is sending notes and telegrams of condolence to those who are in trouble, and of congratulation to those who have achieved some object on which their hearts were set. It is sending flowers and making calls and leaving cards, and generally doing as you would be done by.

So, my dear Viola, if you learn how to dress so as to make yourself attractive looking and acquire the art of starting other people to talk about themselves while you listen with a rapt look upon your face, and if you learn how to say things to people that make them feel pleased with themselves, I think you will have a made-to-order brand of charm that only an expert can tell from the kind that Nature turns out in its most expansive moment.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am 27 years old, educated, talented, attractive, popular, a good business woman. I am married to a man who will make no effort to improve himself in any way, not even in business. He does only what work is necessary in his job. Goes home in the afternoon and sleeps for two hours. Won't go anywhere unless I drag him along and then is a wet blanket, regardless of strangers or friends. I am still young enough to marry again someone who has ambition and I am in a position to do that, while, I wait a few more years, there may not be the possibility. Shall I live on this way, or consider divorce?

ANSWER: Depends upon your own sense of the sacredness of the marriage contract and on how much you care for the man. After all, you know you took him for better or worse and, if the bargain turned out not so good as you expected it to be, you still haven't any right to wretch on it unless the party of the other part has defaulted on his part of the contract.

Of course, there are some no-account men who are so tender and kind, so charming and gallant, so pleasant to live with that they atone for their inefficiency by their social charms, and justify their wives in supporting them as luxuries. But, generally speaking, there is no other husband on earth harder for an ambitious woman to endure than one who is just plain lazy and shiftless, who has no energy or pep and who is nothing but a ball and chain around her feet that keeps her from climbing.

Personally, I think that laziness should be made a cause for divorce both for women and men.

DEAR MISS DIX: I am a young man of 21, in love with a girl of 18. She is studying to become a teacher. I am going to night school, hoping eventually to become a chemist. Now my girl and I love each other very much, but I hesitate to ask her to marry me because if she becomes a teacher she will be much better educated than I am. She says that will not make any difference, but I fear she will not be satisfied with me. What do you think?

ANSWER: I don't think there is any danger of the girl becoming so excessively learned that it will put her out of your class. You are making the mistake of thinking that all education comes put up in schoolbook packages and with a college brand upon it. That is far from being the case. Many of the most intelligent and best-informed people we meet have never been to college at all and have got their education from reading and studying and from contact with life. You are evidently ambitious if you are willing to go to night school and study after your hard day's work is over, and you need not be afraid that you cannot keep up with your little fiancee by reading, even if you cannot go to college.

DOROTHY DIX cannot reply personally to readers, but will answer problems of general interest through her column.
