BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

IN A TIGHT PLACE

When you're in a place that's tight
 Common sense can master fright.
 —Old Mother Nature.

Chatterer the Red Squirrel was doing a foolish thing. He often does foolish things. We all do. But this was a little more foolish than usual. He was climbing a tall tree in the top of which was the nest of Redtail the Hawk. Perhaps I shouldn't say he was climbing. He wasn't really. He was running up that tree. Climbing is slow and usually hard work. Chatterer was running, and running fast. Squirrels are like that. They can run up trees and they can run down trees, and they do when they are in a hurry.

Chatterer was in a hurry now. Yes, sir, he was in a hurry, very much of a hurry. He wanted to peek into that big nest in the top of the tree to see if it contained any eggs. He just had to know. It wasn't any business of his. Of course not. He knew that. Most folks know when they are doing something foolish, but persist in doing it.

"If there are eggs there I won't touch them. Of course not. I just want to know if any are there. I'll just peek and then run down again and no harm will be done," thought the little red-coated scamp.

The nearer he got to that big nest the more excited he became. Supposing he should find several eggs in that nest. Certainly it was big enough to hold several eggs even though they were big, and they were sure to be.

"Perhaps," thought Chatterer, "if there are several one wouldn't be missed. Of course I won't touch one. Certainly not. But I can't help wondering. I haven't tasted an egg, not one, since last summer. I don't know as I ever did have one as big as those eggs must be. I guess one would make me a whole breakfast. Yes, sir, I do so. How I would like to have one. But I won't touch one. Of course not." He licked his lips. You see Chatterer is much like other folk.

"Thinking about good things to eat often makes most of us lick our lips. Now thinking about those eggs led Chatterer to forget something. It made him forget something that was far more important than any eggs could ever be. He forgot to watch out for danger. Always that is a bad thing to do. It is an especially bad thing to do when engaged in mischief, when doing something one shouldn't do. And of course Chatterer was in mischief, and he had forgotten to watch out for the big owners of that big nest just above him.

To this day Chatterer doesn't know what made him turn his head when he did. But he did turn it, and he turned it just in time. He turned it in the very nick of time. Shooting down from where he had been circling in the blue, blue sky, came Redtail the Hawk. Already he was down to the treetops, his great hooked claws were already set to clutch the little Red Squirrel.

What Chatterer did then he did without thinking. It is that way

Contract Bridge

LUCK AND SKILL GO WELL TOGETHER

The contract in today's deal could have been somewhat sounder, but good luck plus good play brought the declarer home.

North dealer.
 Both sides vulnerable.

The bidding:

North	East	South	West
2NT	Pass	3♥	Pass
3NT	Pass	4♦	Pass
5NT	Pass	7♥	Pass

South should have realized that there might be "duplication in the spade suit—i.e., that his own void might be wasted by reason of high spades in the North hand. Thus, a small slam would have been a better venture. At the grand-slam contract, the heart king had to lie favorably.

This, of course, was the case, but East's extreme length in trumps gave South something to think about. West opened a spade, which was lucky for declarer. Having nothing to lose by trying the finesse, South put in dummy's jack, and when it held he discarded a club from his own hand. He then led the heart queen through East, who naturally declined to cover. It was gratifying for South to find the heart king on side, but rather disturbing to find it so well guarded.

South took another trump finesse, then led a low diamond to the ten and took a third trump finesse. He reentered dummy with a diamond and cashed the top spades, discarding two clubs, then he led to the club king and returned a club to the ace.

The fact that East had had to follow suit to the diamond and club leads put South on safe ground, and now, all he had to do was lead the club queen from dummy—with this play it did not matter whether or not East has another club. If he did not, and ruffed the trick, South would over-ruff, draw East's last trump and cash the good diamond. If East followed suit on the club, South would discard the diamond, then lead dummy's last diamond and in that way coup East's trumps.

WOOL GROWERS ATTENTION!

Because of changing market values the Prince Edward Island Sheep Breeders' Association are now prepared to advance eighty (80c) per pound on all unwashed fleece wool delivered to the Grading Station, Charlottetown, for the balance of the season. The balance of the payment will be made promptly after grading and delivery. For further information contact
