

THOUGHTS FOR OUR TIME BY HIS EMINENCE CARDINAL McGUIGAN

The subject of education has assumed a strikingly prominent place in the public consciousness in the last two or three years. Education has, of course, been cherished in this country since its beginning; in fact, it was so normal an element of our society that it rarely became good newspaper copy, rarely called attention to itself. Currently it is rarely missing from newspapers, periodicals or public discussions. Several factors have contributed to making the general public vividly conscious of educational matters:

(a) A substantial fiscal item for education appears prominently on the budgets of families, townships, cities and provinces; (b) the development of skilled industry and international commerce as well as crucial involvement in a diminishing world have given a new priority to education;

(c) the availability of information about every aspect of life carried to everyone by so many effective media of communication compels men, women and children to receive new knowledge daily;

(d) the prosperity of families in this country enables more and more parents to plan extensive education for their children;

(e) the information, so challengingly unfurled to the free world, of the emphasis on education and the prestige of the educated in the Communist world has been received almost as a threat by the free world.

The effects of this new glaring focus on education are interesting to note. Salaries of teachers have risen sharply and new impetus to the teaching career has been given; styles of buildings and equipment necessary for successful education have become complicated and expensive; budgets for education have soared; some boards have demanded longer school days and more of them; comparative reports on educational systems abound, especially of Canadian and Soviet educational processes; industry, commerce and government are increasing aid to educational institutions and projects.

thoughtfully. Many questions come to mind that require considered answers. Is there, for example, a manifest correlation between better education and the complex, expensive school buildings we are asked to construct? To a degree never experienced before, public media of communication (TV, radio, movies, books, advertising) are exerting a shaping influence on the minds of young and old.

Is our formal, school education sufficiently aware of this powerful educative force and can it, or should it, manage the necessary correlation between directed education and this new powerful but unsystematic influence?

Are the school and the home increasingly overlapping in their areas of responsibility, and is the home allowing the school to assume matters that can only be effectively taught in the home?

Can the school avoid a moral responsibility and confine itself to intellectual formation exclusively? What is the responsibility of the adult world of each community in supporting and confirming in practice the ideals presented to the young in the classroom?

SCHOOL AND SOCIETY
In this last respect a controlled society has a real practical advantage over the free one; its system of education arises from its philosophy of man, and so does the total structure of its society; as a result what the young are taught in school will also be found in practice in society.

George Washington Carver once told a conference on racial understanding in the U.S.A., "Your actions speak so loud I cannot hear what you are saying." Sometimes the cynical attitudes of youth seem to be making the same remark to the adult community.

What, we may well ask, is the relation between the school and society? If the adult community is betraying the education of the young then the invaluable stabilizing influence of a good school system is lost to that society.

It would seem that the present might be a good time for a wisely chosen group of experienced, thoughtful and responsible citizens to re-define a definite period of time to make a searching analysis of our educational process—What must we keep? What must we change or add? Why? How should we best proceed?

SCALDED BY COOKER

EXETER, Ont. (CP)—Three men were scalded Saturday when steam escaped from a pressure cooker at the Canadian Cannery plant here. The men had been working at the pressure cooker when a clamp on the door of the cooker gave way, erupting steam in their direction.

COWS DECLINE

There are about 2,321,000 head of cows and heifers-in-milk on farms in England and Wales, down five per cent from 1958.

STUDY CHANGES

No one, including, regrets that the matter of education is receiving serious attention from thoughtful citizens in a free country; vigorous and sound intellectual activity is the very life-blood of freedom.

But there is always a danger that feverish activity, loud talk, rapid change and new experiments will be equated with something necessarily better than we already have. And this is not to say that we should maintain the old simply because it is the old.

If changes are being made in our educational system, and certainly any clear vision of the future reveals that we are discovering new needs, then it is imperative that intelligent people should make such changes most
