

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.

From Wilmer & Smith's European Times. It is very interesting to us who sit in old Europe, following old methods of government as a matter of course, to see how things are done by a people really and immediately self-governing. We may doubt and disapprove of many of the measures, but we are struck across the Atlantic, and think that we should not like this, or that, or the other liberty or restriction, as we would not like to be governed as we are governed. We can cordially admire and honour certain occasional achievements of theirs, which are quite new to us. We are struck by the energy and efficiency. We really hardly know any more striking than the history of the rapid subjugation of the whole of the territory of the States of the American Union; and it is with feelings of the deepest respect, that we read of the action of the State of Maine with regard to this. This course, which is fatal wherever it appears, is now being steadily carried to the state of Maine than in many other places. Bordering on our colonies, and thickly wooded, in a part scarcely settled, it retained a semi-barbarous character, in some respects, to this day. At some seasons, the streets of the townships were filled with a population of white laborers from the woods, Irish immigrants, and Indian wanderers. Till now, the only restrictions were those imposed by the sober inhabitants. By day, the streets were hardly as many as some noisy rolling mill. It was a scene of the most unwholesome and unchristianized life. Last May, when the towns were filled with these strangers, all was safe and order. The houses were clean, the streets were swept throughout 1852. The papers, and such was the state of social peace, that the lawyers had little to do in criminal cases. There were no riots, no disturbances, no Maine Liquor Law. What was that law itself the result of? It is the question that interests all who are concerned in the subject. It is to dispute the consequences of an abolition of temperance. The doubt is, the possibility of the abolition of the liquor traffic, by the sacrifice of something more important than the benefit to be gained.

row. No doubt; but this is because we do not, as a people, desire it. If the Americans were to have a similar law, it would not be admitted of legislation so stringent. But they are self-governed, and therein lies the chief interest of the subject. The Maine Legislature, it is believed, has a very high character. It is believed that it will solve itself by its own wisdom, and that it will save the next generation from it; and that it will be a model for the rest of the country to consider a physical, moral, and social poison. It has been the act of a spirited man who, in his private life, has been a model for his personal habits, imposes a law on himself, and submits thus to discipline, which he would not have done otherwise. It is a very interesting fact, that our fellow-citizens cannot but watch with deep interest the development of this very strong government.

COLONIAL LEGISLATURE.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

Mr. Macaulay's Elective Legislative Council Bill.

Mr. CLARK. He was opposed to the Bill; and he would briefly state his reasons for being so. In his opinion, the Bill, as it is now framed, would be made elective, the Bill, at the same time, contemplated the election of the Council by a class of electors, the majority of whom would be higher than that of the electors of the House of Assembly. From this provision, should it be carried into effect, it would result that a majority of the electors of the Council would be a class of electors, the majority of whom would be higher than that of the electors of the House of Assembly. to make a provision for paying the members of the Council for their legislative services equally with the members of the House of Assembly. The Bill he was opposed to, and he would, therefore, oppose the further progress of the Bill.

Commercial resources are of a cheering character, and the Government are anxious to be in fully as good a position as they were at the commencement of the present year, and to have the means of carrying out their various schemes of improvement and raising property which are far from doubtful.
