ting in front of it, a telephone receiver fastened over his ears like an operator at a switchboard, and a stenographic notebook in front of him. The man also nodded, without change of expression, and Murphy handed a similar receiver to Jack. Jack adjusted it to his head. It gave him an uncomfortable feeling to be "listening in" on another person's affairs. Then a voice came. He frowned. A moment later his hand went up as if to jerk the eavesdropping thing away from his ears, but the hand dropped again. He sat very quiet, with stern eyes and stiffening jaw. Now and then the poker-faced young man shot a swift glance at him.

"So you thought you could double-cross me?" All of Wayne Gorham's suavity was gone. Mrs. Payne's anger flared quickly. She gave him the benefit of a disdainful stare. "Perhaps you have not learned," she said cuttingly, "that well-bred people do not express themselves in such a manner." "But they can accept thirteen thousand dollar bribes to spy on people they live with? That's all right, I gather!" She raised her head haughtily. "You are unspeakable!" Frances barely breathed it. She leaned back in her chair, cold with fear. What did this cynical creature mean to do? She had been insane to put herself in his power.

"Suppose I make myself clear," Gorham leaned forward. The smile was gone. "You undertook to keep watch on the Staunton girl and report to me whatever you found out about her and Moreland. There was thirteen thousand eight hundred dollars against your name on my books, and that was to be canceled for your work. How did you do it?"

He drew out the envelope she had sent him and slapped it down on the desk. "Today I get this from you, an empty envelope addressed to Mrs. John Moreland at the Granliden Apartments. You said you had found it in Miss Staunton's rooms at the Ritz, but you didn't think I knew, or had brains enough to find out that you had left the Ritz just five weeks ago."

"You found this out, but you kept it for your own purpose, which consisted chiefly of following up another woman's husband. If I had this weeks ago when all the row was on—oh, what's the use!" His voice snapped off disgustedly. Frances Payne was watching him with bright horrified eyes. "You would have used it for blackmail!" she said breathlessly. "I should call it a little late in the day for you to question my motives. The point is that you didn't deliver the goods. Now I'll tell you this much." He dropped his voice suddenly to a confidential tone. "I began this thing out of curiosity, but I'm in it now to win. I am going to see the lady this afternoon. I know where she is too, in which I am pretty sure I have the advantage of you. What I want you to do is to keep Moreland busy and away from her for the next few weeks. I have an idea that she will ultimately take a trip west, say to Reno or vicinity. When she comes back you can give a dinner to your dear friends, Mr. and Mrs. Wayne Gorham. I'll pay for the dinner."

"You—you beast!" She was on her feet, trembling and scornful. "Think it over. The thirteen thousand and odd is still on my books, and I have several letters from you. They make quite a pretty scandal if they get in print." He went over to the door which led directly into the hall and unlocked it, once more smiling and urbane.

"You need my help and I need yours," he added coolly. "Think it over."

When she had gone he strolled back whistling under his breath. His first intention, on catching the scent of a mystery, had been to make the Staunton fortune pay him a pleasant little income, now, on impulse, he had decided to marry it. Every man has his weak point and Gorham's was his enormous conceit with regard to his prestige with women. Once driven to get a divorce from Moreland, he had no doubt, that a whirlwind courtship would carry the day. And she was a fascinating little piece, with her cream-and-gold loveliness and daintily aloof air.

He walked slowly across the room deep in his new project, and stopped absentmindedly by the side of a big roll-top desk against the wall. His eyes traveled absently along the desk, were suddenly arrested. He bent down to examine something near the floor. Wires! They seemed to go down through the flooring. What did they connect?

He went over to his desk and took out a small electric torch, flashing its clear little light behind the roll-top desk. When he straightened again his eyes were alert and shifty, but cool. He stood close to the desk and spoke clearly as if putting in a telephone call. "Glebe me Chelsea 5207."

He waited a little for his imaginary call. Then he spoke again. "Hello, Saunders. Meet me at the Grandon at 1:30 and bring everything with you. I'll have my bag and bring them back here. It's all right now to put them in my safe. No, don't come here. Make it the Grandon at 1:30."

He tiptoed back across the room and opened a closed door. He always kept a traveling bag there ready for weekend trips or sharp-

Heavy Rains In Nebraska Continue

OMAHA, Neb., July 13 (AP)—Nebraska rain clouds, which have been dumping water in huge amounts since Saturday night, let loose again today with rains of six to eight inches. Fortunately, the new drenching by-passed the Big Blue River watershed, still trying to get rid of run-off from a 13-inch week-end downpour. Anticipated heavy flooding at Beatrice, largest Nebraska city on the Big Blue, failed to materialize. At Cedar Bluffs one man was killed in a cave-in caused by the rain. The new rains hit hardest at Omaha on the eastern border, in the Danbury area of Southwest Nebraska and around Fullerton in Central Nebraska. It was near Fullerton that five persons were drowned early Sunday when caught by a sudden flood on a highway.

Suits Have Nipped-In Waistlines In Fall Suits

BY DOROTHY ROE ASSOCIATED PRESS FASHION WRITER New York, July 13, (AP)—The bustline comes into its own again in the previews of fall fashions being staged this week for the press. Mae West pockets are the device adopted by Pauline Trigere to accent Hollywood's favorite curves. These are distended pockets placed strategically just above the bustline for added illusion. Soft drapery also is em-played for this purpose by practically all designers this season, many of whom use in addition the "illusion" neckline on evening gowns. This is the startling device of a pleated frill which ascends from the waistline and apparently is all there is to the bodice. The illusion is that there is an invisible bra-top beneath. Miss Trigere shows also the "poodle" coat, a sensation of this season, made of the shaggy "doormat" fabric which a number of designers have imported. Nettie Rosenstein, noted as the original sponsor of the "little black dress" as the favorite uniform of North American women, goes far afield this season in one of her most exciting and beautiful collections. For dress-up wear she likes gold or silver lames, gold-beaded nets and a general air of all-over glitter. Her suits have nipped waistlines, rounded curves and an air of trimness softened by dress-maker touches, while her coats sometimes are cut in complete circles. This designer also employs many slim tiered skirts to break the severity of the ultra-slim lines. Another device is her "strap-hanger" dress, a simple sheath trimmed all over with loop tabs suggesting its name. GANDHI PILLAR ON NILE JINJA, Uganda—(CP)—The Uganda Indian Association is erecting a Gandhi memorial pillar on the banks of the Nile near here. It will tower over a great expanse of water when the Owen Falls hydraulic dam across the Nile is completed.

CATCHES BABIES FILEY, Yorkshire, Eng., July 12 (Reuters)—A rescuer successfully caught two babies, one in each hand, as the children were thrown from a window in a blazing house today. The man, standing on a wall, tucked the first child under one arm. Then he caught the second in one hand and with one child under each arm calmly jumped off the wall.

Bike Crashes Grow; Parents Are Cautioned Police yesterday issued emphatic warnings to forestall another major outbreak of accidents involving children on bicycles. Cycling accidents reached a peak Saturday, when 10 out of 11 persons injured in traffic were children on bicycles. Parents must take the initiative in counseling children on traffic safety if another death and injury wave is to be forestalled, the police accident investigation unit advised. Between 1:30 and 3:30 p. m.

Signal stops like this. Note angle of arm and open palm. Avoid sudden stops.

Don't ever do this. It obscures vision, makes steering hard, and makes balancing difficult.

HEY KIDS, BE CAREFUL!

It is not always the motorist's fault when his car runs into a bicycle. Plenty of youngsters wheeling around the streets don't know that they risk injury or death by stunts, careless riding and failure to give the proper signals. Study the pictures above, learn the hand signals and use them.
