Religion and Life

By Very Rev. George C. Pidgeon, D.D., L.L.D. First Moderator of the United Church of Canada (Copyright)

Some years ago a religious journal, which had a wide circulation in this country, published regularly "A thought for the month." One of them began as follows:

"Religion is our way of reacting to things that are inexorable. It life presented itself to us only in forms which our will could freely mould and change, escape or destroy, there would be morality, perhaps, but no religion. But life does not so present itself. Instead the larger aspect of our experience consists in taking things as they are, in making adjustment to life's inexorables."

The passenger has a great deal of freedom on an ocean liner. He may read or play, eat and drink, make friends and occasionally opponents, fall in love and plan for the future or revel in the enjoyment of the moment without any plans at all, and all through he is made to feel that the comfort and convenience of the passenger is the law of the ship. But he has no say about the ship's course, and the fortunes of the voyage with regard to fog and ice and wind and sun he must accept as best he can.

On one voyage across the Atlantic we had as a fellow-passenger a young girl from the American west on her way to London to visit her mother. Just as we were near Anticosti she got a wireless telling her that her mother was in New York dangerously ill, and wanted her at once. She went to the captain and begged to be put ashore, but in vain. The captain could not grant her request; he was in the grip of orders and circumstances which denied him liberty of action. There was nothing for her but to reconcile herself to the inexorable, and this she did in a way that commanded everyone's admiration.

Then when we reached Glasgow she learned that the message which had caused her distress was either a cruel hoax or a stupid blunder because her mother was in London eagerly awaiting her arrival. To us observers her hard experience was a parable of life. There is so much in our lot with which we have nothing to do. The course of events is determined by factors completely beyond our control. Youth moves out and age moves in stealthily and steadily, and death awaits us all at the end. Our religion decides how we are to adjust ourselves to all life's inexorables; the writer above quoted says that our answer to them is our religion.

Really our answer is only part of our religion even though it is an essential part. One's faith brings two ministries to his soul, the ministry of inspiration and the ministry of comfort. The first deals with the things that are to be subdued the second with the things that are to be accepted. The first moves us to bring more and more things out of the inexorable into human control; the second reminds the soul that even when circumstances or events are beyond our control the Spirit is still superior to its setting and in the end cannot be prevailed.

The first of these is the dominant mood of today. Never was man's belief so firmly fixed as now that man is lord of nature and that all things are, or ought to be under his dominion. Invention is bringing one element after another into harness, and back of invention is science dining into our ears the fact that we can harness nature's forces only when we understand them and that the way of progress is prying into her secrets and bringing one after another of her hidden things to light.

Yet now and then nature's powers break loose with terrific energy, laugh at our puny strength, and tear to shreds the harness with which we would bridle her and hold her in the shafts of our plans. Rimouski and Winnipeg are cases in point. The hearts of all Canadians go out to our fellow-Canadians in these places where nature's forces, which ordinarily they used for their own purpose, have wrecked with unmanageable violence the works of their hands.

The whole future of these cities depends on the spirit in which they meet incalculable calamity. The whole nation will help and the help must be immediate and abundant. But when all is done that can be done, the attitude and purpose of those who have suffered will determine their future. We know what their answer will be. Not only will they endure bravely, but they will take steps to make sure that these blind forces will never again get out of control. These are powers and resources that can be made to serve and it is the duty and privilege of civilized men to subdue them. So all through human experience, the ancient commission runs to replenish the earth and subdue it.

Yet when all is done that God enables man to do, so much remains that has to be endured. In spite of all our advances, disease breaks down the strongest. Weakness appears where strength was expected, where strength endures the remark: There are so many afflictions worse than death. Moral collapse is one of them. What has religion to say when the home is broken up by the infidelity of one, and the souls of children clouded by a parent's sin.

There are many similar ills that flesh is heir to. This much is clear no matter what the character of the calamity—the sufferer's reaction to the stroke determines the effect it will have upon him. It will make him or break him, according to whether he defies or gives way before it. At this point faith should enter the picture, and faith always brings Christ into action. If with Him we decide that our suffering must be made to serve His ends He will bring us victory out of disaster. It was out of long experience of such unmerited sufferings that Paul wrote: "In all these things we are more than conquerors through Him who loved us."

BULLETINS FROM BIRDLAND

WINIFRED E. WILSON

WANTING PUBLICITY

Display is important in the life of a male bird, especially when advertising for a mate or trying to intimidate his rivals. The gorgeous Peacock loves to show off his magnificent tail; the gay puffed male Pheasant puts on a regular performance. Note how the hens in the barnyard lack the attractions of the cocks.

Not without reason, nearly all mother birds are drably dressed while the fathers often wear very bright colours. The showy male courts publicity, which would never do while incubating eggs. The male Redstart, black with flame coloured patches, dares not draw attention to his home. For that reason the building of the nest and hatching the eggs must be left to his wife, that is putty colour with pale yellowish patches. The fact that we seldom see her is proof that she is well camouflaged.

The hard-working wife of our little green Hummingbird has no ruby throat as he has. Mr. Mallard of the bright green head expects his brown-headed spouse to do the chores. There are numberless examples of males with vivid spring plumage whose wives are sparrowlike in appearance. The wonderful Rose-breasted Grosbeak in his costume of black, white, and deep pink, the Red-winged Blackbird whose black plumage is offset by scarlet epaulets, the Bobolink with strangely arranged black, yellow, and white, these are but a few with greyish brown wives.

The leaf green colour of the brilliant Scarlet Tanager's male blends into her surroundings. It matters not that Mr. Cowbird is iridescent black with a bronze head; but it is important that Mrs. Cowbird should be dull grey, so that she can deposit her eggs in nests of other birds, then slink off and let foster parents nurse her children. However, when the male is housekeeper, as is the case with Phalaropes, the female has the brilliant plumage, and is also larger.

Singing is another method of gaining attention, and so, with a few exceptions, this is done by males only. While little Mr. Yellow-throat shouts, "Witchity-witchity-witch", on your right, probably his gentle wife on your left is quietly, and unnoticed, attending to the infants' wants. Were it not for the clear, happy voice of Mr. Song Sparrow, we would scarcely know him by sight. How often do we see him before we hear him, so unpretentiously is he dressed? Very seldom. He attracts our ears rather than our eyes. How identify bird songs?
