OTTAWA—Brigadier Geoffrey Walsh is a husky six-footer who has made the Army his career since he graduated from Royal Military College 21 years ago. He's rated as one of the keenest military minds in the service. This week of May 28th, 1000 donors urgently needed.

At the end of World War II, Walsh was Chief Engineer of the first Canadian Army, a colonel who served under him describes him as "very, very sound—the kind of officer who thinks things out quickly and thoroughly." In that, and in other ways too, Walsh is remarkably like Brigadier J. M. Rockingham, who commands the 25th Infantry Brigade Group in Korea. In preparing his men for service in Korea, Rockingham was a stickler for proper training. Walsh is too. He sets a high standard for his men, but he never asks the impossible, or more than he will do himself.

Legends have grown around this lanky, long-nosed engineering officer who led Canadians in the famous raid on Spitzbergen, won the D.S.O. for coolly building a bridge in Italy under enemy fire, and developed the techniques of handling "storm boats" for assault landings. It was by using these boats the way Walsh suggested that Canadian troops rescued 1200 survivors of the British 6th Airborne Division at Arnheim.

Walsh doesn't miss much. For example, when he was commanding troops maintaining the Alaska Highway, he and a fellow officer drove past a steel truss bridge being prepared for installation. Their jeep was rolling right along, but a glimpse was enough to tell Walsh that the bridge rockers had been installed incorrectly. The other officer couldn't believe him, so they went back for a second look. Sure enough, Walsh was right.

The Alaska Highway was his toughest post-war job. When he took over from U.S. Army engineers the task of maintaining this 1200 mile long road in the sub-Arctic wilderness, he first had to build an organization to do the job. Much of the road maintenance equipment was worn out. Floods continually destroyed large sections of roads. And the highway had to be kept open all winter, in spite of temperatures as low as 84 degrees below zero.

When Walsh enters a room full of officers, he brings with him such personal magnetism and force of character that everyone soon is conscious of his presence. Without seeking to do so, he dominates the gathering. He's a hard taskmaster, but he drives no one harder than him-

Strange But True

By F. H. MacArthur

Cattle, like all creatures instinctively associated with man, have played a large part in folklore, heresy and religious beliefs. The ox, for example, is associated with St. Luke. In some lands domestic cattle are still held in the greatest veneration. In India, cattle are privileged creatures, being allowed to pillage crops and roam the public street at will.

One of the world's rarest creatures is the gray-necked picathartes, discovered by C. S. Webb in Africa in 1948. This unique bird is so rare that not more than half a dozen white men have ever set eyes upon it. There are two species of this extraordinary creature, but very little is known about them. The yellow-necked picathartes was first discovered on the Gold Coast, but has not been seen for almost a century.

We are inclined to look upon the scalp-lifting American Indian as a blood-thirsty rascal scarcely fit to live. But the writers of these blood-curdling stories scarcely ever draw our attention to the white settlers' flair for lifting scalps from the domes of Indian men, women and children.

It seems to be a well established fact that the American settlers took more Indian scalps, all told, than the Redmen ever lifted from the heads for whites; white men were permitted by law, to wipe out the whole Indian race. Even bounties were paid on Indian scalps in the early pioneer days, so that scalp hunting became quite a paying game. For the early American settler, especially in New England, and, believe it or not, a warrior's scalp brought more money than a prime beaver skin.

In 1722 Massachusetts authorities placed a bounty of $75 on every Indian scalp. Later the price was pushed up to $400. Thus it may be seen that fire water was not wholly responsible for the high death toll among the North American Indians. Under date of August 22, 1722, Jeremiah Buxter of Boston recorded: "This day twenty-eight Indian scalps self. His officers tell of his going two and three days without sleep, when things were sticky during the war. He's credited with an amazing ability to size up situations and arrive at the correct solutions. His troops swear by him, confident of both his ability and his fairness. If anyone pulls a boner, Walsh lets him know in strong Army terms. Conversely, if credit is due, Walsh gives it.

Most people don't realize the engineers are a fighting corps. Often they work under fire, and often Walsh has been under fire with them, for he's no desk officer. He's a fighting man, and by all indications an excellent choice to command the Canadians who will serve under General Eisenhower.

brought to Boston, one of which was Bombazen's (a Christian Mission Indian) and one, Friar Rasle's." It mattered not whether the scalps were those of men, women, or children, except that a slightly higher price was paid for men's. Indeed it was the white man who spread the practice among many of the eastern Indians of North America, for, prior to the arrival of the whites, the only tribes on the continent that lifted scalps were the Iroquois, Creeks, Chickasaws, Muskohegans and Choctaws.

During the Revolutionary War, both the British and Americans paid bounties on scalps of their enemies, whether Indian or white. Think of it!

Canned rattlesnake is a regular dish in many leading restaurants in the United States. In 1942, I visited a large cannery in Florida and was informed by its manager that he found it difficult to supply enough rattlesnakes to meet the ever increasing demand. Then he went into a long-winded talk about the quality of snake food: the white flesh, its freedom from bones and gristle, its excellent flavor, etc., yet it did not appeal to me in the least.

Once, however, I dined on alligator's tail and thought I had eaten halibut steak, as it tasted the same.

The Bible did not place much faith in astrology, for we read in Isaiah: 47: 13-14 — "Thou art wearied in the multitude of thy counsels. Let now the astrologers, the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators stand up and save these from these things that shall come upon thee. Behold, they shall be as stubble; the fire shall burn them; they shall not be delivered from the power of the flame."

According to the Scriptures, Rehoboam was quite a man with the ladies. In Second Chronicles 11:21, we read — "And Rehoboam... took 18 wives and three score concubines; and begat twenty and eight sons, and threescore daughters."

The Good Book also has something to say about women wearing men's clothes and vice versa. You'll find the little story in Deuteronomy 22: 5 — "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment, and all that do so are an abomination unto the Lord, thy God."

The charivari so common at Island weddings, where crowds gather and make a lot of noise with horns, kettles, etc., is a curious custom dating back to the days of Paganism. Just why we still cling to such an old custom is hard to understand.
