

MISS Karen Anne Willis, Miss Kaye Younker and Miss Janet MacDonald are photographed as they appeared on the Home Economics program held Thursday

Home Economics Program Presented At Q. C. H. S.

A Home Economics program and garment parade was presented by the girls in grades seven, eight, and nine at Queen Charlotte High School on Thursday afternoon, June 19th, in the school Auditorium.

In her address of welcome, Anne Storey, a grade nine pupil stated that the aim of this three years training is "to get a grounding in the simple, basic learnings that will be useful around the home, and to which we can add as the years go by."

The curtain opened on a scene where various family members were represented, each in turn pointing out how the study of Home Economics in its broadest sense can improve the individual, the family, and the nation.

afternoon at the Queen Charlotte High School.

Anne is wearing a summer frock, Kaye Younker is in Bermuda shorts and Janet has a cotton dress. These skilled young people made these attractive summer clothes and modelled them at the Home Economics program.

and many and interesting were the different fashions displayed. Besides dresses, other garments modelled were cotton and woolen skirts, long-sleeved blouses, jumpers and sportswear.

The commentator for the show was a grade nine pupil, Daphne Armstrong, along with the Home Economics teacher, Mrs. A. L. Acorn. Over one hundred and fifty pupils were enrolled in the Home Economics classes this year. The music for the program was supplied by Mr. Royston Muford, music teacher at the school.

Notebooks, which are a required part of the Home Economics course, were on display as also were various samples of work done in the Manuel Training classes.

The program closed with the singing of "The Queen", after which refreshments were served by members of the grade nine classes.

ELLEN'S DIARY

"Bless This House" Say All Dear Island Brides

There is so much to enchant one, she may well be overcome by all the June loveliness to be seen now on every hand. Beauty of sky and earth, of sun and shadow, of meadow and tree. In poetry she may say with some apology to a Maytime poet, since flowerings come later to Island places:

"How shall I tell it?
What song to sing?
June's such a radiant
Miracle thing.
How shall I go?
Where shall I go?
See, there is iris along the hedge-row

And somewhere in remembered Island places, feet a bit damp in the grasses where they grow in their natural habitat, we suspect the Wild Flugs are now in bloom, while here and there in our flower-border, the white iris leads our (small) procession of iris in blossoming.

In personality, we think the iris is a regal flower reserved, stately and beautiful, a fitting inspiration for the conventionalized Fleur-de-lis of the standard reared by the intrepid French explorer Jacques Cartier "On the chieftain's height" in ancient history of Canada.

Bees, ingratiating, busy ones called to pay court to ours today and the hummingbirds too drew up to enjoy presently a quick stirrup-cup at their doors.

This was a day when the sky rejoiced "in the morning's birth" it seemed, when we bound by duty to the housework found excuse too to be abroad. We came to look in at the chicks, in a coop too young yet to be allowed to the freedom of the barnyard with its hazards of cats and wheels. Of a variety of shades, whites, blacks, buffs, they are a fetching barnyard-crow.

We stopped to watch a sparrow fly up to a nesting-nook with an unwieldy length of straw in its beak, and a strange goldfinch pluck dandelion down in the near pasture, plans doubtless as eager as those of the sweet young brides of the June-time who these days look ahead with much anticipation to establishing a home with their loved one-only rooms perhaps, or a cottage, a dear shelter of place in the less of an Island hill, or a more imposing house whence broad lawns or acres sweep graciously away from the door.

But wherever only the "Four walls", within which is kept a home or a house, dependant by and large as we see it upon the woman. She it is who in the main creates that atmosphere of love and content which keeps the place, making it a beloved sanctuary or in time, more and less only an indifferent dwelling to come to, for either the family or friends.

Now the cropping required of the name is done. We saw James today fit a wedding hoe with a brand new handle and with Mack give the name of a helper to others.

"And this one will be for your grandmother. Surely" James offered in our hearing, "she can be a little help to us this year. She could weed a bit from the end of each drill" and the pair chuckled together in a companionable mixture of youth and elder, that was good to hear.

And another Friday winds its way now off into the night, eyes in an uplook, fixed on a hilltop star.

Until tomorrow — — — Diary Good-night.

Graduating Class Is Given Inspiring Address

At this time of the year many splendid addresses have been given to students. The following from "The University Abroad", a Commencement address, was given by Carl McFarland at the Montana State University, June 6, 1949. It was published by the Montana State University Alumni Association. Its inspired message is suitable in any year for students in any part of the world.

Today's exercises seem as an act in a play seen and heard before. You are a post-war graduating class—just such as another one here twenty-five years ago. . . You have heard of the Great Depression which struck us here twenty years ago; and you may have heard rumors of others to come.

Yet you are much better off than we were. For we were graduated in the midst of that Great Depression. Men in business suits were selling apples, so the papers said, on the streets of New York. Mines were closing. Jobs were not to be had. Legislatures were retrenching.

What do you suppose happened to the graduates of those Depression years?

They have spread over the face of the land. They worked hard in their different fields of endeavor, to make a very slow start. But they have prospered remarkably—thereby demonstrating perhaps the truth of old Dr. Johnson's observation that "adversity is the state in which man most easily becomes acquainted with himself." Many of them now constitute what may be called our "University Abroad." They have demonstrated, moreover, that the State and its university are neither provincial nor isolated from the main current of American life.

The Depression graduates zealously burrowed into law offices
