INFANTRY.

The 1st Battalion of the Grenadier Guards.
The 34th Regiment, now at Corfu.
The 92d Regiment, from Malta.
The 71st Highland Light Infantry from Corfu. The 90th Light Infantry from Dublin.
The 97th Regiment from Athens.
The 82d Regiment, now at Edinburgh, will not be sent to the East, as stated in the Times.

The battalion of the Guards will be attached to Major General Bentinck's brigade, which will then consist of four battalions; but in point of number, it will not differ much from the other infantry brigades. There will thus be left on home service the 2d battalion of each of the three regiments of Foot Guards, which may be looked upon as so many strong depots to keep up the war battalions to their effective strength. The five battalions of the line mentioned above will be joined by the 68th Light Infantry, which is now in the Crimea, but is not attached permanently to any division. These six battalions will be formed into the fifth division of the British army, and, as three of the regiments are light—the 68th, 71st and 90th—will probably constitute a light infantry brigade. We believe no arrangement has yet been made as to the command of this division, but it is not unlikely that Colonel Lockyer, of the 97th (who held a command at Chobham,) and Colonel Denny, of the 71st, will be the Brigadier generals.

THE WAY THE RIFLEMEN WORK.

One of the most wonderful things I think is to see the way in which our riflemen go about in small detached parties, crawling along on the ground up the side of a hill, till they appear to be within 300 yards of the enemy, and thus they lie on their bellies till a chance offers, when crack goes a Minie, and down falls a Russian. I was informed most credibly, that one of these brave fellows a few days since thought he would go and do a little business on his own account, got away from his company, and crawled up close to a battery under shelter of a hill, lay on his back and loaded, and turned over and fired, when, after killing 11 men, a party rushed out, and he took to his heels, but, sad to say, a volley, fired after him by this party, levelled him with the earth, and he was subsequently picked up with 32 balls in his body.

The Paris Constitutionel publishes the following letter, written by a Zouave (a French rifleman) before Sebastopol. We have before had accounts of the individual warfare of the francs tireurs, who are said to have picked off the best of the Russian artillerymen, and thus to have rendered the fire from Sebastopol uncertain:

"My Dear Father:—I have been leading of late the life of a poacher. I am every day on the look out for a Russian—being attached to a company of francs tireurs, or riflemen. Our duty is to fire at the Russian artillerymen and to protect our own, who have no reason to be dissatisfied with us as yet. I cannot say the same of the Russians, who appear to suffer greatly from our rifles. To give you an idea of our mode of acting, we set out at two in the morning, fully accoutred, with a supply of ammunition and biscuit. On our arrival in the trenches, we are provided with bags, a shovel, and a pickaxe. At a given signal, we jump over the parapets with the agility of stags, and take refuge in some sheltered spot under the forts, where we dig a kind of rabbit hole to hide in. We place our bags as a protection on the side facing the enemy, and we then set to work. We remain in this sort of tomb the entire day; we leave it at dark, often exposed to a shower of grape-shot. You will naturally ask, dear father, what we have to do all that time. I can assure you, that we have plenty to do. We load and fire in rapid succession, and every shot tells on a Russian artilleryman. The other day two officers were standing on a piece of timber placed on the top of a tower opposite my statition for the purpose of having a view of our works. With two shots I brought down those gentleman, and at the same moment, the batteries let fly a discharge of balls, shells, and grape shot, which fortunately passed over my head."

LORD HARDING AND THE TWENTY-THIRD FUSILIERS.—The promoters of the special subscription on behalf of the bereaved survivors of the 23d have felt the declaration of those who oppose the scheme (that the regiment is chiefly composed of Irishmen and Scotch) almost as a libel upon their countrymen. Their sense of injustice has reached the air of the commander in-chief, who in a private letter to a friend, thus refers to the subject:—"I send the last return of the Welsh Fusilliers, signed by its gallant and distinguished leader, who fell so nobly at its head in the action of the Alma,—I wish the return had specified Welshmen, and I shall give directions that in the Welsh fusileers the four countries shall be separately and distinctly recorded. The number was 969, of which only 8 were Scotch and 182 were Irish. But the Welsh fusilliers have always been a remarkable regiment, and their conduct on every occasion has shown that they have in no instance degraded from their former fame. The Welsh fusiliers were engaged at Albuera, and by a curious coincidence, they lost 14 officers killed and wounded, the same as at Alma; but the loss of men was greater at Albuera, namely 324 men, and at the Alma 197 men."

EUPATORIA.

Captain Brock is said to have formed a body of Horse Marines, by mounting the Marines from the ships on horses obtained from the Tartars. The men not being able to ride well, "At the head of each horse was a Crim-Tartar, holding by the bridle, and in this formidable manner the 'Marine Cavalry' were organized for the charge, and they set out with a bold front towards the Russian encampment. On they came with a resolution and grace highly creditable to their national character. They looked very models of discipline as they approached the enemy's lines, who were rather puzzled to make out the meaning of the double character of the force. To resolve this knotty point they sent a shell or two whizzing into the midst of the advancing squadron. The bold British Marines did not mind a shell much; but not so the Tartars, who no sooner witnessed this significant sample of the reception they were to meet with, than they quickly turned and fled towards the city. The horses now finding themselves free from restraint, or at best but governed by an unskilful hand, followed the example of their truant owners, and strewed the wayside with their riders, who came tumbling to the ground in most picturesque confusion, not a little to the mortification, though very much to the amusement, of the spectators near the town. Captain Brock, who awaited with much interest the result of the Cavalry demonstration, was not a little surprised to see the Cossacks, on the retreat of the British, turn and fly in their turn with the celerity of fear, a fact for which he felt wholly unable to account by the application of any known rule of military tactics. They fled, however, leaving not a trace behind, and the governor continued to cudgel his brains; without effect, for an explanation of the fact. The true explanation, however, which could never be surmised, came naturally enough in a day or two subsequently. Some Cossack stragglers, captured by the English troops, when questioned on the subject, stated that the Cossack commander new very well what he was about in ordering the retreat. He was fully aware that the British Cavalry never turned tale upon a foe except for a purpose. The purpose, in the present instance, was plain the retreat of the British was a feint to draw the Cossacks, by pursuit, into an ambuscade for their destruction. The chief was not to be caught in so evident a trap; he was an old warrior and instead of advancing to face a danger, not the less palpable that it was hidden, he prudently fled from the lurking foe. And so the Marines, after all, effected the object of their captain."

SUMMARY.

In addition to news published as received by Telegram from Boston, under date 13th inst., we learn that Louis Napoleon announces that powerful provision will be made for the Allies in the Bessarabia.

The Russian losses in battle of the 5th, confirmed—viz., 15,000 killed and wounded.

The Moniteur affirms, that the Russian army on that occasion numbered 70,009 men.

The Russians are fortifying the Dnieper line, near Mohiloff.

General Baraguay D'Hilliers is to command the French troops about to proceed to Bessarabia,

Lord Palmerston still remained in Paris.

The Hurricane of the 14th did not extend beyond the Black Sea, and (as stated in our Telegram from Boston) Ships of the Line and Transports felt it severely. "Report" was, that two Transports were lost—this wants confirmation.

Several vessels of the British and French Fleets suffered much, and were in great jeopardy. Two of the latter said to be lost

The Constantinople correspondent of the London Papers, says that 32 Transports foundered; but this, for the obvious reason, that no such number of Transports could by any possibility have been on the Black Sea, at the date of the Hurricane, is clearly a fabrication. [For 32 read 2.]

It is said the Times was "riled" at not receiving the intelligence of the battle of the 5th, from the war department, in advance of contemporary morning Journals, and attempted to get up a panic, accordingly. The Duke of Newcastle writes to the Morning Chronicle that "the effective force of the British contingent in the Crimea was, at the latest advices, not less than 28,000 men."

The Allied forces to be employed in Bessarabia is set down at 40,000 French, 35,000 Turks, and 10,000 British contingents.

The inquiry into the circumstances of the attempt to overthrow the Railway train at Trellick, Ireland, had terminated in a verdict of wilful murder against five individuals.

The London Times is charged with having wilfully misrepresented the numerical force of the British troops in the Crimea.

The Balaklava correspondent of the London Times is very wrath with the "miscreant Russian Gunners who actually fired into the mass of hostile cavalry, Russian and British, (commingled in deadly strife) and mowing down friend and foe together."

A number of Regiments of the embodied English Militia had volunteered for service in the Crimea. It was supposed that Parliament would be called upon for an increase of the army, and that three Regiments would be received as second battalions of as many corps on active service.

Sir Colin Campbell's report to Lord Raglan acquits the Turks of cowardice in abandoning their batteries He says "The Turkish troops persisted as long as they could and consequently suffered considerable loss in their retreat;" and again, "The Turks in batteries No 1, 2, 3, spiked their guns, retired, and some on the left, of the 93rd.

The following is said to be perfectly authentic: "The Allies are only 162 toises (146 English yards) from the walls of Sebastopol Their artillery has made a tremendous breach, which they are preparing to enter." No date is affixed to this communication.

The steamer Pacific brings London papers to the 29th of November.

The Collins line were to change their days of sailing after the departure of the steamer of the 29th of November, from Wednesday to Saturday, in order that the commerce of both sides of the Atlantic might be inconvenienced as little as possible.

A despatch from General Canrobert, dated Sebastopol, November 13th, says, that the operations of the siege were progressing, and that the health and spirits of the troops were admirable.

HASZARD'S GAZETTE.

Wednesday, December 27, 1854.

A Colonial and United States Mail arrived yesterday morning, via Georgetown. An English Mail was confidently expected, but it had not arrived in Halifax when the Packet left Pictou. Letters were received by the Pacific, via New York, and also a few papers specially addressed, we are again indebted to Chas. Walsh, Esq, for a London paper, containing the Despatches of the Allied Generals, and for other details of the battle of Inkerman, on the 5th Nov. We have copied as much from them as our time would allow. The advantages of our semi-weekly issue will now be more apparent to our readers, we are generally the first to furnish them with important news, and we are seldom behind any of our contemporaries, although they are often several days behind us.

The British Mail Packets, for the present, will leave England every alternate week instead of weekly, and proceed from Liverpool for Boston, calling at Halifax, commencing on the 9th Dec.
