ELLEN'S DIARY

Now The Dark Enfolds The Farmsteads Gently

"Oh dear!" That was Mamma Starling's voice. She was up on her terrace then looking out to the countryside about. The doormat she had been cleaning, she still clutched - that one with the word "Welcome" inscribed on it, which is spread by the door. We continued spreading our wash. A heavy shirt of James we pinned up, the thought came, we would put away now to lie with other items of winter-wear in a drawer of the old press upstairs, to be taken out on a Fall day, after crickets had played their last tunes... In the interval we should have roses to love, and be - clovered meadows, and all the charm and delight of the summery days. "I may as well laugh as cry" Mrs. Starling commented. "But this house is a mess, to say the least. And I have that hatching to tend. And honestly it does become monotonous. Just sitting there hour after hour idly, with nothing to see or hear. "Nothing!" the word lingered in mind. No beam of sunlight stealing into her home, for which to be grateful? No rainbow to see from her window? No friendly wind of the west to cheer her? Desolate indeed is the one who has nothing to entertain or amuse or console her - who has never learned to live with herself. "And do you know what he said this morning?" she queried. "Keep a stiff upper lip for a few more days, and then all your troubles will be little ones!"
