That Body of Yours

SPEEDING UP GROWTH IN SHORT CHILDREN

A boy sixteen years of age consulted his family physician because he was some inches shorter than the average or normal and came from a family who were of normal height. His physician prescribed a sex extract, testosterone, with good results.

Now we read of a group of seven-year boys, ranging in age from 3 1/2 to 15 years of age, who were short but otherwise normal. None of them could be considered a dwarf, as they were not much under size and their bodies were well proportioned. They belonged to well-to-do Mexican families, were on a well-balanced diet, and lived under good hygienic conditions. The deficiency in growth before treatment and the gain after it was measured with those observed in normal children as reported in the "Official Table for Growth of Mexican Children."

The treatment consisted of weekly intramuscular injections of an aqueous suspension containing 25 mg. testosterone per injection. The treatment was given for a period in which the children showed a normal rate of growth for between one and two and a half years in the other seven.

What were the results? The rate of growth was speeded up in all patients except three adolescents who showed a subnormal rate of growth during the first treatment for three or four months but then showed a normal rate of growth for the second period of treatment that lasted from four to eleven months.

The only side effects were the rare appearance of genital disorders in which case the treatment was stopped temporarily and then discontinued.

These patients discontinued treatment as soon as they obtained a satisfactory height. Some of them have been followed up for one or two years during which period they continued to grow at a normal rate.

At what age is this treatment considered to give best results? Dr. Fierro del Rio who is reporting this series, believes that best results are obtained when the testosterone is given during the most naturally active period of growth, namely between the ages of 9 and 10 years. He found that this drug speeds up the rate of growth while it is being used and also establishes a normal rate of growth after it has been discontinued.

We must remember that these boys were otherwise normal except for their height, were on well-balanced diets, and lived under healthy conditions in every way.

ELLEN'S DIARY

by an Island Farmer's Wife

This week—what has it done for me? By what shall we recall it, after it is gone?

"Here, Ellen," someone leaving us said with a gay smile today, proffering a four-leafed clover she had just picked from among the grasses at her feet. "I'll give you this to remember me by."

So nice tokens the week also gave. Particularly, we shall remember of it the beauty and blossom of the fields, the rich fullness of the haylands soon to fall before the silver blades of the mowers. . . . We think too we shall never forget the peace and serenity of this night, kept as it is by old summer stars and a bright moon of the haying. Bewitchingly it smiles down from heights in the far blue, on the resting fields, on the farmsteads, dewy now and still, work of week done; on the farmhouses about, showing their friendly lights, content in the shadow of the coming Day of Rest.

Busy days we have had—the farmers in the fields and the housewives at the various cares of their rounds, at which there came the quiet moments for reflection-time to ponder and weigh those questions which seem to mind relative to the mysteries of our own especial sphere and circumstance of life. So many puzzling "Whys?" there seem to be in regard to our afflictions and crosses. And yet, none beyond reasoning or past understanding. "Behold I have refined thee, but not with silver." One said. "I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction."

We are much indebted to Mrs. D. J. Gordon, Oakland, California, for a thoughtful poem, composed recently and toward the close of a long and tedious convalescence. It is so good we take the liberty of sharing it with others who perhaps have been wondering why their hitherto pleasant round had been suddenly disturbed by accident or illness. We remember that this lady, who contributes the most interesting articles to this paper from that storied State to the South and West, is an Island farm-lad of once who after long absence still holds its scenes most dear.

Chastened
(By Mrs. D. J. Gordon.)
"A little bird when on the wing
Was dashed to earth, a helpless thing,
'Tho' its voice remained sweet and soft,
Nevertheless could it soar aloft.
The way was long, the road was rough,
My soul cried out: 'enough,
enough'
While lying on the valley floor
I felt I could not bear much more.
And no wise purpose could I see
In all this chastening of me.
The days and weeks passed slowly by
As I again, again, asked: 'Why?'
And still no answer can I find
For mine is only finite mind,
But, somewhere in the infinite
It lurks, hidden from mortal's sight.

"The lame and halting is my step
I'll find my way, ('tho' low in pep)
Out of the valley of despair,
Out, up and into clearer air.
The Ill ne'er mingle with the throng,
Perhaps I'll sing a finer song
Than if my path led up the height
And was strewn o'er, with flowers bright.

Now little bird, again you're free
So come and make your melody
And none will see your broken wing
If fairer, sweeter song you sing."

An agricultural expert received an enquiry from an amateur poultry-keeper, who asked: "How long should a fowl be allowed to sit on eggs?"

The expert replied: "Three weeks for chickens, four weeks for ducks. A month went by, and the poultry-keeper sent another letter: 'I let the hen sit on the eggs for three weeks,' he said 'and no chickens came. I didn't want ducks, so I took her off the nest and sold the eggs.'"
