Happenings Of The Week

"Nay, that's right; but why wear you your leek today? Saint Davy's Day is past." So says Gower an English officer in the Kings Army Fluellen, an honest Welsh Captain in the English Army in Shakespeare's Henry V. St. David is the patron Saint of Wales and on March the first Welshmen all over the world celebrate St. David's Day. Then it is the time for the romance of Wales is remembered and in this is spread a love for and a knowledge of "The Land of Castles" — Wales! Even within the past year one likes to remember the great International Women's Institute Conference held in Wales, at which were represented twenty countries. This was opened by the Lady Megan Lloyd George, who inherits from her famous father, the equally famous Lloyd George twinkle in the eye. And in our own province we say to our young Prince of Wales College Curiers: We are proud of you, valiant Welshmen.

The Right Technique For Doing Laundry

By ELEANOR ROSS

It's still winter, but when the day is bright, and not too cold, it is wise to hang out the laundry to give it a drying and bleaching in the sun.

Always use the mason jar technique for the very fine clothes that they don't have to be handled at all while they're wet, except for hanging them to dry.

Fill a jar two-thirds full of warm soapsuds, screw on the cap and shake the jar until the suds have thoroughly cleansed the hose. Dump out the hose and suds gently; fill the jar with warm rinse water, cap it again, and shake for thorough rinsing. It's just about the simplest washing method you could devise, an ditho safest.

A New Idea

Something new under the sun—the matching housecoat and tablecloth, both in beautiful prints, big plaids, harlequin designs, pretty florals.

Best way to keep the combination at its best, is to launder them together. Each must be as fresh as a new day, or the charm of the whole idea is lost.

Since they are of cotton, both housecoat and cloth go right into the washing machine and emerge brightly new; that is, if care is taken to protect vivid colors by using warm, not hot, soapsuds. And dry in the shade.

Incidentally, any smart girl, once she selects a housecoat pattern and the fabric, should be able to run up the twosome easily.

Saturdays off from work are when most husbands do about half as much around the house as they planned.

Widow, 60, Ponders Offer Of Marriage

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: I have been a widow for several years and have been terribly lonesome. But I have hesitated to go out with anyone, as I know I could never love again.

Quite recently I met a very fine gentleman about my own age, 60, whose company I was sure I could enjoy, and this proved to be true, as we dated several times. Then out of a clear sky he asked to marry me, saying he loved me more than anyone on earth. I explained that I couldn't love him or any man, but still he insists he loves me desperately.

Lately after being out with George I simply can't sleep and I see to be all tied up in knots of tension. I am sure I could never love him as he loves me, and it seems unfair to accept his attentions in this case, yet I don't want to give him up; and I don't want to hurt his feelings, as I do like him.

Some of my friends say that my sleepless tension after seeing George proves that I do care for him more than I realize — and I am just trying to steel myself against falling hard for him. They also advise a heart-to-heart talk with him, and say that if he loves me as he claims — I am sure he does — he will see my side of the story, and we can go on being the best of friends the remainder of our lives.

I have known George's background and friends over a period of some 20 years and I know he is a wonderful man. Also, I know I just don't know what to do. What would you suggest? R. L.

Story Sounds Trifle Hollow

DEAR R. L.: Somehow the story sounds a trifle hollow, maybe because you are making a lot out of a little—possibly unaccustomed to dating and gallantries. So you've been a widow for several years, and terribly lonesome? Well, the obvious remedy for loneliness is good companionship, and if you can possess it, why not have it?

You say you've been offered marriage by a fine congenial man whose society you enjoy, and whose background and friends you've known for two decades. But you sidestep because you don't love him and never will love again, you predict.

My reaction at this point is—How absurd can a woman be? Just what are you looking for, in the years that are left to you? And what is this twaddle about never loving again? Are you so heartless, soulless or dehumanized as that? To be alive at all, in any real sense of the word, is to care devotedly about another's welfare — not in a high romantic way, necessarily; but rather as an exercise in forgetting self, in directing one's energies outward in a meaningful pattern. This is the basic prescription for a long happy healthy life (bearing accidents).

What is bothering you, honestly? Is it the speed of George's courtship? You say you met him "quite recently". Are you doubtful of his sincerity? Do you think he is perhaps more interested in your property than you? Or truth to tell, do you feel that he is a little cracked, despite his likeable sociability — and might be more of a problem than your loneliness in the long run? Granted you say he is wonderful — still that blanket praise may cover a multitude of thorny traits difficult to endure at close range.

Madame Grundy Stiffes Hungers? Your nervous tension after dates with George probably refers to a kind of struggle between erotic hungers and Madame Grundy. You don't want to marry again, but you find it comforting to be loved, or desired by a man who professes love. And you feel obliged to maintain ladylike control of the situation. Which causes emotional confusion and dissatisfaction, a stress that usually banishes sleep.

What to do? Don't be so vainglorious about George's interest. Relax and let the companionship prove its worth, if any. Take time to know George as he is, if he is willing to keep on courting. If you don't want to marry, simply say so — but don't try to tie him down to lifelong friendship. That sort of thing should develop naturally, not by manipulation. M. H.

A Dancer Steps Out In Restaurant Field

By IDA BAILEY ALLEN

The Chef and I were battling our way down windy Lexington Avenue, New York City. "Here's a quiet, nice-looking restaurant," he suggested. "Let's go in for dinner."

"See, Chef," I said, "here's something interesting on the restaurant menu—fresh vegetable broth. And there's an unusually attractive hot appetizer dessert."

When we were about to have dessert, the proprietor, a smart dapper-looking young man, stopped to introduce himself — Walter Bourie.

"Are you especially trained in food preparation and service?" I asked him.

"No," he said, "but I've studied it for years. I was a dancer; the food was often so poor I decided that, when I could save up enough money, I'd go into the food business myself and provide good food for the public. So I opened this small restaurant here in New York."

"I found you can still make moderate prices and sell at a profit."

"Ah, but more than that, my young friend," put in the Chef. "You have used a good method in cooking and imagination in service."

"For example, in your hot vegetable broth I taste a blend of pot liquors reserved from cooking the mild vegetables. And you have cleared it, as we chefs do, to make it a consommé. That is the mark of a successful restaurateur."

ELLEN'S DIARY

by an Island Farmer's Wife

The first one of the lambkins is here. It arrived tonight, the event not in accord with the plans of the farmers who had set a later lambing season but still as it happened not unexpected.

"It's a good thing we put the flock indoors this evening," one farmer agreed. "It's likely the lamb would have perished if it had been born out in the cold."

There it is however, a small creature, with new and quavery bleat snuggled beside the ewe in the fold, warmly sheltered there with the "ninetly and nine" of the flock.

This week—how shall we remember it, we wonder? By the peace and delight of the February days; by the white drift of light snowfall and the sunshine and blue sky of hours that were fair. By hushed dawns and serene dusks and gray clouds of falling weather and brooding, resting on the hills; by clearing stars and a morning moon and all the ever-changing miscellany of items which go to make up a winter week.

It brought the sawing to Alderlea when first rings of the saw rent shrilly the winter stillness about. And then when we became accustomed to the sound it echoed not unmusically in the valley about. More than one afternoon was devoted to the work with altogether six "good men and true" lending their assistance to its progress, before the chore was

"Den de Massa ob de sheepfol' Dat guard de sheepfol' bin. Goes down in de gloom'rinn' meadows, Whar de long night rain begin An' He let down de bars ob de sheepfol' Callin' sofy, 'Come in, come in.'"
