A STRANGER'S STORY.

A TERRIBLE DRAGON THAT CAME ALL THE WAY FROM CHINA.

The Startling Experience of an American Who Spent Twenty Years In the Celestial Kingdom — A National Holiday That Brought a Myth.

Frequenters of the pretty knoll near Eighty-sixth street remember a statue of Washington that stands there, bearing a Latin inscription that declares the original personage to have been "The Father of His Country."

Near this statue on a bench one fine evening during the past week sat an elderly and highly respectable old man. His was the only settee on which a seat remained, and perforce I took a place by his side. Before long my neighbor manifested a disposition to be companionable, and we soon struck up a conversation.

We exchanged compliments upon the weather, and he commented upon the naval parade that he said he had witnessed from the same point. This led the conversation into foreign channels, and my companion told the following strange story:

"I went out to China as supercargo on one of A. A. Low's ships and remained 20 years in the middle kingdom. I made a careful study of the people and grew to admire their thrift and energy, but I never could overcome the feeling of distrust born of experience. They were always sly and secretive.

"Vindictive to the utmost degree, they would stop at nothing calculated to injure an enemy or to avenge a real or fancied wrong. I became a convert to the Buddhist faith through the ministration of a fine old bonze who joined me at a tea garden nearly every night and poured the doctrines of that pure and beautiful faith into my ears with a persistency that ultimately won my heart.

"He spoke exquisite pigeon English, but the fervency of his exhortations would have done him credit at any quarterly meeting. I was educated in the fear of Tao and of its representatives in the Flowery Kingdom. I was especially warned against the ambitions of this life, and the nobility of charity was constantly impressed upon me. So firm did this sly old bonze implant the philanthropy he preached in my bosom that I regularly supported him and gave him every piece of cash that remained after discharging my monthly score with my almond eyed landlady. I never dreamed that I was being 'worked.'

"I bought experience as I bought religion, with my hard earned money. When I gave out, the sleek old bonze, who had not enjoyed a square meal for months before he met me, but was not as fat and hearty as one of Rabelais' gullygut friars, told me with tears in his eyes that he had been ordered on a mission to faraway Thibet.

"This is only prefatory to the curious incident that occurred to me in my own yard the night of the 4th of July. I am now about to tell you exactly what happened, and I assure you it fills me with terror."

The old man's face was now turned fully toward me. He had twisted round in his seat, and one of his feet had tucked itself away under him. He was very pale and cast suspicious, timid glances down the sidewalk behind him. Judged by the look in his eyes he unmistakably saw somebody approaching, but I could not see a single moving object.

"On July 3, being desirous to celebrate the national holiday in a patriotic manner, I visited a large fireworks depot down town. It was late to make purchases, for most of the best goods had been sold. I bought a lot of red lights, a box of firecrackers and a few yards of punk. I like the smell of punk. It carries me back to Canton.

"In rummaging about among the odd corners of the shop I found a very oddly shaped porcelain cup, much like a marriage jar in shape and size. It bore an inscription that I at once recognized as pertaining to the worship of Buddha. It bore a fancy semblance to a sacred light, burned always in the temples. I sought to be informed why it had found its way hither, but all I could learn was that it had come in a case of goods—doubtless inserted by mistake.

"No value was placed upon it, and I recently secured the precious trophy for a quarter of a dollar. I carried the valued piece home, sending the crackers to my grandchildren. I confided the secret of my great find to nobody. Oh, that I had not been so selfish! Beware of secretiveness, my friend. I acquired it in China. It is a relic of barbarism.

"Yes, I was determined to be alone, and when midnight had struck in St. Agnes' church"——

I knew that the clock in St. Agnes' didn't strike the hours, but did not interrupt him. He also drew his other foot up on the bench.

——"I went into my yard behind my house, and placing the porcelain jar in the center of the grass plot I lighted it.

"The flame was of a dull grayish hue, and as I stood gazing in wonderment and reverence a huge monster began to rise out of the box like a pharoah serpent. It slowly stretched itself along the grass. I was filled with terror. It was a dragon! The emblem of the middle kingdom! Don't be startled at what I tell you but it has been my companion ever since. It is right behind you now, coming across the grass.

"You see, I know the ways of the Chinese—even of Chinese dragons—and they have to be conciliated; but, bless your heart, I don't trust them. Why, I haven't slept a moment since this dragon became a part of my life. I have no faith in him because he is a Chinese dragon.

"I was even deceived about the character of the porcelain jar. Between us, it was one of the horrible dragon pots, made to be sent to traitors by the prime minister. Its receipt means death. The submissive Celestial arranges his affairs, lights the fire, lays down, shuts his eyes, and—well, the dragon devours him."

"Now, may I ask a question," said I.

"Oh, yes! You do not doubt me?"

"Certainly not; but why do you bring your dragon over here among children? It isn't safe. There might be an accident."

"You are quite right," was the rejoinder, and he completed the sentence with all the cunning of his kind. "But he must have his swim in the river."

A large, muscular man, whom I had not before observed, made his appearance at this moment, and addressing my companion familiarly said:

"Come, baron. Call the dragon, and we will go home."

Taking the newcomer aside, I asked:

"He has told you the story also?"

"Oh, yes. He tells it to me once a day."

"And you live"——

"At the Bloomingdale Insane asylum."

In this life a man can console himself for a great sorrow by confiding it to others, and I am glad to have lightened the burden of the "baron's" blighted life by bearing his tale and stroking the neck of his mythical dragon.—Julius Chambers in New York Recorder.
