ELLEN'S DIARY

Tonight A Witch Will Ride Across The Starless Sky

"I'm big enough to go out with Mack and the other fellows, this Hallowe'en" Alex said this morning. "I won't be afraid of any ghost. I'll like them!" he grinned.

And shall we too, who have enjoyed many a Hallowe'en past, not again catch something of its witchery? Shall we not be aware of it when the enfolding dusk descends? The very twilight will be different from that of the October evenings gone before. Watch it! Somewhat eerily it will flood in over the hilltops and across the autumn fields.

Stand at the door. Or better still come to some vantage point of yard which commands a wider view of the countryside. And look and listen.

See the evening's veil fall dusklike. Soon now the strange folk — that ghoulish ilk, the kith and kin of this night, will be on the prowl. Already it may be. Up by the line-fence perhaps, or maybe nearer at hand.

There! We hold our breath. Did you hear that rustle in those leaves there on the grass? And not a breath of wind moving! The silent band is foregathering. Yes, coming out of old firesides tales to haunt us...Is that the poplar in the hedgerow? Eek, it moves! It must be a wraith. There is much mystery in the air.

The darkness deepens. The night-sounds have strange echoes. Even as we come indoors, closing the door behind us, the sound rings hollowly.

And we draw a breath of relief to find we are out of it, and safely indoors again.

Presently there will be a scurry of young feet on a verandah and smothered laughter; then a rap, and a quiet entrance of strange-clad figures: gnomes straight from gnome - land, pixies mischievous things brown and dimpled, with pointed ears. A witch, dark-gowned and caped, with a tall pointed hat, and dressed all in white.

And "Trick or Treat! Shell out!" a spokesman will demand gruffly. So this night will come to us at Aldeglen. And we shall chuckle and laugh... and remember also kindly, Hallowe'ens from years that were young. Yes.

Tonight, the witches ride the sky.

Their mounts, a kitchen broom.

Above the roof - tops high they'll soar

Across the crescent moon.

Tonight odd ghosts will walk the ways.

A fearsome sight, I ween.

Steps, breathless rustles in the leaves

On this, the Hallowe'en.

So youth will rove the whispering paths

Upon this night which nears.

And gather up to treasure well,

Sweet memories of young years.

Until tomorrow — —Diary—Goodnight.
