ADAM BADE

CHAPTER IX.

HETTY'S WORLD.

WHILE she adjusted the broad leaves that set off the pale fragrant butter as the primrose is set off by its nest of green, I am afraid Hetty was thinking a great deal more of the looks-Captain Donithorne had cast at her than of Adam and his troubles. Bright, admiring glances from a handsome young gentleman, with white hands, a gold chain, occasional regimentals, and wealth and grandeur immeasurable—those were the warm rays that set poor Hetty's heart vibrating, and playing its little foolish tones over and over again. We do not hear that Memnon's statue gave forth its melody at all under the rushing of the mightiest wind, or in response to any other influence, divine or human, than certain short-lived sunbeams of morning; and we must learn to accommodate ourselves to the discovery that some of those cunningly-fashioned instruments called human souls have only a very limited range of music, and will not vibrate in the least under a touch that fills others with tremendous rapture or quivering agony.

Hetty was quite used to the thought that people liked to look at her. She was not blind to the fact that young Luke Britton of Buxton came to Hayslope church on a Sunday afternoon on purpose that he might see her; and that he would have made much more decided advances if her uncle Poyser, thinking but lightly of a young man whose father's hand was so foul as old Luke Britton's, had not forbidden her aunt to encourage him by any civilities. She was aware, too, that Mr. Craig, the gardener at the Chase, was over head and ears in love with her, and had lately made unmistakable avowals in luscious strawberries and hyperbolic panes. She knew still better that Adam Bade—tall, upright, clever, brave Adam Bade—who carried such authority with all the people round about, and whom her uncle was always delighted to see of an evening, saying that 'Adam knew a fine sight more of the natur' o' things than those who thought themselves his betters—she knew that this Adam, who was rather stern to other people, and not much given to run after the lasses, could be made to turn pale or red any day by a word or look from her. Hetty's sphere of comparisons was not large, but she couldn't help perceiving that Adam was 'something like' a man; always knew what to say about things; could tell her uncle how to prop the hovel, and had mended the churn in no time; knew, with only looking at it, the value of the chestnut tree that was blown down, and why the damp came in the walls, and what they must do to stop the rats; and wrote a beautiful hand that you could read off, and could do figures in his head—a degree of accomplishment totally unknown among the richest farmers of that country-side. Not at all like that slouching Luke Britton, who, when she once walked with him all the way from Buxton to Hayslope, had only broken silence to remark that the gray goose begun to lay. And as for Mr. Craig, the gardener, he was a sensible man, to be sure, but he was knock-kneed, and had a queer sort of sing-song in his talk; moreover, on the most charitable supposition, he must be far on the way to forty.

Hetty was quite certain her uncle wanted her to encourage Adam, and would be pleased for her to marry him. For those were times when there was no rigid demarcation of rank between the farmer and the respectable artisan; and on the home hearth, as well as in the public house, they might be seen taking their jug of ale together, the farmer having a latent sense of capital, and of weight in parish affairs, which sustained him under his conspicuous inferiority in conversation. Martin Poyser was not a frequenter of public houses, but he liked a friendly chat over his own home-brewed; and though it was pleasant to lay down the law to a stupid neighbor who had no notion how to make the best of his farm, it was also an agreeable variety to learn something from a clever fellow like Adam Bade. Accordingly, for the last three years—ever since he had superintended the building of the new barn—Adam had always been made welcome at the Hall Farm, especially of a winter evening, when the whole family, in patriarchal fashion, master and mistress, children and servants, were assembled in that glorious kitchen, at well-graduated distances from the blazing fire. And for the last two years at least Hetty had been in the habit of hearing her uncle say, 'Adam Bade may be working for wages now, but he'll be a master-man some day, as sure as I sit in this chair. Master Burge is in the right on't to want him to go partners and marry his daughter, if it's true what they say; the woman as marries him 'll have a good take, be't Lady-day or Michaelmas—a remark which Mrs. Poyser always followed up with her cordial assent. 'Ah! she would say, 'it's all very fine having a ready-made rich man, may happen he'll be a ready-made fool; and it's no use filling your pocket full o' money if you've got a hole in the corner. It'll do you no good to sit in a spring-cart o' your own, if you've got a soft to drive you; 'he'll soon turn you over into the ditch. I always said I'd never marry a man as had got no brains; for where's the use of a woman having brains of her own if she's tackled to a geck as everybody's a laughing at! She might as well dress herself fine to sit back'ard on a donkey.'

These expressions, though figurative, sufficiently indicated the bent of Mrs. Poyser's mind with regard to Adam; and though she and her husband might have viewed the subject differently if Hetty had been a daughter of their own, it was clear that Adam for a penniless niece. For what could Hetty have been but a servant elsewhere, if her uncle had not taken her in and brought her up as a domestic help to her aunt, whose health since the birth of Totty had not been equal to more positive labor than the superintendence of servants and children? But Hetty had never given Adam any steady encouragement. Even in the moments when she was most thoroughly conscious of his superiority to her other admirers, she had never brought her self to think of accepting him. She liked to feel that the strong, skilful, keen-eyed man was in her power, and would have been indignant if he had shown the least sign of slipping from under the yoke of her coquettish tyranny, and attaching himself to the gentle Mary Burge, who would have been grateful enough for the most trifling notice from him. 'Mary Burge, indeed! such a sorrow-faced girl; if she put on a bit of pink ribbon, she looked as yellow-flower, and her hair was as straight as a hank of cotton.' And always when Adam stayed away for several weeks from the Hall Farm, and otherwise made some show of resistance to his passion as a foolish one, Hetty took care to entice him back into the net by little airs of meekness and timidity, as if she were in trouble at his neglect. But as to marrying Adam, that was a very different affair! There was nothing in the world to tempt her to do that. Her cheeks never grew a shade deeper when his name was mentioned; she felt no thrill when she saw him passing along the causeway by the window, or advancing toward her unexpectedly in the footpath across the meadow; she felt nothing when his eyes rested on her, but the cold triumph of knowing that he loved her, and would not care to look at Mary Burge. He could no more stir in her the emotions that make the sweet intoxication of young love, than the mere picture of a sun can stir the spring sap in the subtle fibres of the plant. She saw him as he was, a poor man, with old parents to keep, who would not be able, for a long while to come, to give her even such luxuries as she shared in her uncle's house. And Hetty's dreams were all of luxuries: to sit in a carpeted parlor, and always wear white stockings; to have some large, beautiful earrings, such as were all the fashion; to have Nottingham lace round the top of her gown, and something to make her handkerchief smell nice, like Miss Lydia Donithorne's, when she drew it out at church; and not to be obliged to get up early or to be scalded by any body. She thought, if Adam had been rich and could have given her these things, she loved him well enough to marry him.

Orwell Notes.

Quite a number of people are taking advantage of the suitable time for house hauling. The old church at Uigg, which was lately replaced by a nicely-finished church, was hauled away by Mr. Roderick McLeod. Some of the gear giving away, two horses were seriously injured. Mr. D. Martin, taking advantage of the teams present, hauled another building off the same premises.

A mysterious light, which has been seen several times in an obscure part of the district, has caused quite a sensation among the inhabitants of the surrounding vicinity. 'Old men and holdams on the streets do prophesy upon it dangerously.'

A grand lottery for a gold watch took place here a few days ago. People taking advantage of the opportunity thus offered to procure so valuable an article, tickets were readily disposed of. All the ticket-holders being present at the drawing the excitement ran high, but as number twenty was drawn, Mr. John Masters smilingly advanced with the corresponding ticket in hand, showing he was the fortunate winner.

While a man and wife were getting down Findley's hill the horse kicked, sending the dashboard flying over the heads of the unfortunate couple, and smashed both shafts, leaving the mystified pair getting down the hill in a horseless car.
