LAMARTINE ON TURKEY.

Lamartine is a poet, not a historian. With the highest regard for truth, and doubtless earnestly desirous to exhibit only that which shall bear its test, his lively imagination, his high poetical temperament, and the ardent glow of his feelings, constantly carry him away, so that however we may be delighted with his style and spirit, it is impossible to feel confidence in his statements and conclusions.
We felt this particularly when reading his travels in the Holy Land, after having personally explored many of the scenes which his graphic pen had portrayed. We found, that he was always more desirous of producing a strong and happy impression upon the reader's mind, than of conveying geographical and statistical knowledge, of value to the student of the Orient.

This appears the more striking the moment that we come to read a work in which he is called upon to discriminate with care, between that which is true and false, to separate (as the historian must) prejudices from the solid, and canvass acts and facts with impartiality.
Then we need the inflexibility of the judge, rather than the warmth and passion of the poet.

The friendship of the Sultan of Turkey for Lamartine is well known. The oriental prince, conscious of the affable and courteous French man, presented him with an estate in the neighborhood of Smyrna, and earnestly desired that he would take up his residence within his dominions, and convey the fruits of his mission to him as an ardent admirer, of Abdul-Medjid.

Lamartine, availing himself of the present struggle, which has been awakened throughout the civilized world, has devoted himself to the preparation of an extended history of the Ottoman Empire, which is now in the press, and is to be published, the first of which is just issued by the Appletons, and is now before us. The introduction is devoted to an energetic and bold statement of the present position of England and France, as the Allies of Turkey against the encroachments of Russia. We have never seen the argument in favor of the Allies more graphically set forth, nor in a form more likely to command the attention of the public, and to enlist their sympathies on the side of France and England, than in the few pages with which Lamartine introduces his work. He relates the early efforts which he has been making for advancing civilization his dominions, his efforts in favor of religious toleration, and the rapid progress which he was making in the general improvement of his people.

He however frankly admits, that he has committed a great error in agitating the question of the Holy Places in Palestine, and the "abridging a pretext to Russia to interfere in the domain of the Sultan, which France assumed." "In terms of the greatest Roman." He speaks also of the "fit only for a contempt of those quarters."
"It is fit only for a contempt of those quarters," "about places on the face of the globe," "the sacred soil of our worship, and the remains of that one drop of the world's blood is worth more than all this pompish arrogance, and these jealousies of pilgrims."
"The Turks," he says, "also maintain public impartiality, respect, and peace about these sanctuaries," and that the bloody contentions of the Christians, "have done nothing, and will only light on fire and destroyed the Holy Places for which they fought. France withdrew her pretensions, as soon as she discovered the danger of an outbreak with Russia, in consequence of her attempts to adjust the matter in controversy in the Holy Land; but Russia has not been so ready to abstain from the same. She insisted, that the Sultan should recognize the Czar as 'Collige in the Empire.' The Czar demanded that the twelve pious members of the Council of the Holy Places, and upon the soil of the Sultan, should be placed under the protection of the Emperor of the East, and that the Sultan should become the Pope of the Greek Church, and the Sultan should be their nominal civil ruler.
Lamartine says nothing of the desires of the Greek Church, but he says, 'We would now subject to the Sultan, to enjoy the protection of Russia. He says nothing of the iron sway which the Sultans as the conquerors, not the rightful monarchs, of the Greeks in Turkey, have for long ages administered; but believing, doubtless, in the divine right of the present Sultan, he represents this desire on the part of Russia to be the protector of the Greeks, as a pretext for depriving the Sultan of his sovereignty, assuming in fact the Empire of Turkey for himself. He then brings out in bold relief the immense advantages that would result to Russia, and the vast evil which would be inflicted upon Europe, in case the Czar should be able to establish his throne at Constantinople." "There," Napoleon said, "leaning on the Baltic and the Bosphorus, Russia will subjugate Europe and Asia to the same yoke."

In another chapter, Lamartine portrays with a wonderful grasp of knowledge and foresight, the consequences which would result from the success of Russia in her designs upon Turkey.
How much coloring his poetical fancy may give to this picture, others can judge as well as we, as he is now dealing, not with the past, but with prophecy, and looking out upon the future.

The appearance of this book at the present moment is favorable to its reception by an eager public, who are always charmed with the appearance of this popular author, and who will now be specially gratified in studying the views which this eminent man takes of the subject that is agitating more than any other the world at large.
