The Housewife Needs To Buy Very Carefully

"I see that the women across the country are set on bringing down the prices of foods" a caller of this morning offered. "I wonder if they will get any results for their efforts?" "Well, they're at least making their complaints noticed" we said. "James the only man about at the time, must finish an end of choring before he could take the visitor on a tour of the barns. "And" we added, "if it does little to the prices, it will likely make for more careful shopping on the part of the housewife. She will weigh values before tucking an article into her shopping-cart!" "It's quite a chore, this shopping for foods." "It's good to have a list" we said. "That's what my woman says" he nodded. "Good to!" we twinkled, "to stick to it!" "Yes. Then there is no straying to the highways and byways of shelves" "no looking around as James would say, "to see what else she can buy" we chuckled. "And what about gimmicks we queried "She never did bother with those." "There are so many choices these times" we said. "And if one must shop in a hurry-without a list- she's lost!" "I'm not in love with this self service" he said. "It was more satisfying to hop 'over the counter". We asked for a pound or a quart or gallon or a yard of goods, and got it without having to pay for any extra frills of package or container. We carried those with us, the jars and cans to hold anything that would run. Otherwise we got it in a paper bag, or wrapped in an old newspaper - perhaps a foreign weekly, which gave us some reading besides!" he chuckled. "Those were the days!" James, come by, smiled. "There

MARY HAWORTH

Quarring Is Preferable To Undercover Hostility

DEAR MARY HAWORTH: Having back to a discussion of whether quarrelling clears the air ("achieves tranquillity," someone said), I personally believe that a "little discourtesy" is a lesser evil than concealed hostility.

I have been married for 20 years to the man I love. In the early years of marriage our manners were above reproach and our love was ample, yet we often felt tense and anxious.

From time to time we each sensed a mysterious withdrawal in the other's mood, painful and confusing to experience, and also impossible to deal with, since we both were unwilling to voice any comments that weren't sweet and courteous.

Then, thank goodness, we learned to quarrel: Granted that courtesy insulates against abrasions in passing contacts, as in the office or a crowded bus till I am sold on honesty in honesty in preference to courtesy, if one wants a really close loving relationship.

A quarrel which begins "You have hurt me and I am sorry" has a middle part, such as "I can see I hurt you and now I am sorry, but at first I was angry at you because you hurt me...." etc.

Sometimes this middle part of the exchange consumes much verbiage. But even so, it is best to get it all out in the open and over with, a process which leads to renewed understanding and mutual forgiveness. It also leads to renewed awareness of mutual need of one another, hence achieves not only tranquillity but joy.

When I hear a couple boast "We never quarrel..." I am dubious (perhaps wrongly) about the depth of their relationship. Not rating their sins, I wonder if they simply don't care enough to quarrel? Or, if they say as we once were: caring very much but not trusting their love enough to expose it to their honest feelings?

Heated words may be destructive, yet also they may cast warmth and light. Good manners used to conceal a lack of warmth would be very cold comfort, I believe. S. G.

DEAR S. G.: It seems to me you are missing the point of the initial discussion, meanwhile wrestling with a bogeyman of your own concocting in the field of semantics (science of meanings).

As I recall, the "courtesy" debate was sparked by a matron's asking how to cope with one malicious utterance directed at another daughter-in-law, a gracious girl.

I advised the matron, in effect to tell the malicious daughter-in-law to "cut it out", in her mother-in-law's presence, at least. Interested readers promptly mailed in supplementary judgments, some pro, some con, which in my view gave off more heat than light, inasmuch as their comment was intended, transparently, to justify their own habitual performance in respect to sounding off.

According to my dictionary, to quarrel is to quarrel, find fault, disagree antagonistically, wrangle violently, etc. - modes of assertive behavior that can't possibly improve any relationship; but rather will put to death, eventually, whatever inner concord may once have existed and struggled to survive. It is an enemy of love, constructive communication is an agent of possible reconciliation.

Communication has to do with outspoken, unarmed, candid efforts to know, and be known by, the person addressed. It em-
