Murder Could Not Kill

must have been in contact with Brett subsequently! Otherwise, how could his knowledge be explained? No one but Brett or someone in contact with Brett could have informed him that he, Brett, had been in Gordon's company. It would be fatal information to give to a stranger. The interrogations might make him go straightway to Scotland Yard.

Still watching Robin closely out of his dark, half-closed eyes, the other saw his hesitation and apparently misconstruing it, himself broke the momentary silence.

"Yes. They tell me I was the last person that this Brett saw before he went off his rocker and started doing people in. At least down at Scotland Yard they more or less told me that. I expect its there you heard of me?"

With intense relief Robin grasped eagerly at this opportunity of a way out.

"That's so," he agreed. "Actually it was about this fellow Brett I wanted to speak to you."

"I got nothing more to say," was the sharp reply. "Nothing more than I told Scotland Yard. They got out of me all I had to tell, you can bet on that."

"What took you down?" Robin persisted.

"Their advert, of course. What do you think? Immediately they advertised for information about his movements I goes straight down to hand 'em mine. They didn't say as they've found anyone who saw him after me did they?"

"No, no," Robin assured him hurriedly. "They didn't. Really, as we are both in a sense mixed up in it, all I wanted to hear from you yourself was what you thought of Brett."

"Thought of him? Darned little, I can tell you. He's nothing more nor less than a regular old boozefighter."

"He—was merely a chance acquaintance, then?"

"See here!" Gordon exclaimed abruptly. "Since the Yard told you about me, what the hell's the sense of all this? You're an artist, ain't you? What you working up to? Want to lift my face, too? Of course he was a chance acquaintance! What you getting at? I didn't know him from an Eskimo before he started chinning to me in the Negroes."

"I quite understand how you feel, Mr. Gordon, I must seem rather an inquisitive person, I admit. You must please forgive me. Scotland Yard did not tell me much. Hardly anything. I don't suppose they are very communicative at any time, and naturally I am more than a bit curious, being involved in the wretched affair as I am. So, frankly, I'll be very grateful if you'll tell me precisely what happened. Was he drunk when you met him?"

"Drunk? He was full to the neck and his back teeth awash. He could stand, but that was about all I felt half sorry for the blighter. Told him to get back to his hotel and lay down. He asked for my arm, so I left the Negroes with him, but when we got a little way along the street he began to attract too much attention for my taste, so I advised him to get a taxi back to his hotel quick—he seemed to know enough for that—and sleep it off. Whether he took a taxi or not I don't know. That's the last I saw of him, and I wasn't sorry, I give you my word."

"I'm very much obliged to you, Mr. Gordon. Sure you won't have a drink?"

"No; that's all right," Gordon grunted and went across to rejoin his friends.

Robin finished his drink quickly and departed.

His initial essay in the art of criminal investigation had yielded nothing of value. He had established the fact that Brett had undoubtedly been in the company of Maurice Gordon before the murder, but apparently that fact had been known to the police from the beginning.

Laurette herself provided the weirdest puzzle of the whole affair. He could not get out of his mind that, she had revealed that morning it was Lessing who had told her that he, Robin, had been following her the previous night. Precisely in what way had Lessing learned that? Since Lessing had learned about him, why had he not asked Laurette the reason for her visit to "The Man With a Scythe"? For whoever had observed Robin must surely have observed Laurette, too.

True, she had suggested to Robin that he might not have been followed all that way—had seemed alarmed at the possibility that he had. Had her alarm been real or assumed? If real, the implication was that she was afraid to admit Lessing to her confidence.

Devilish odd. After all, she was engaged to the fellow. Was it possible that Lessing knew all about her visit to "The Man With a Scythe" and deliberately was lying low? If so, why?

Now Robin found it impossible, though he tried to direct his thoughts in a different direction, to refrain from reaching the startling surmise: what if Lessing and Laurette were accomplices? Accomplices in what? Why had Lessing kept him under observation last night—as apparently he had? Dammit, what right had the fellow to do that?—what cause?

Sudden wrath welled up in him. He would not be stalked and hoodwinked any longer. He made a swift decision: he would see Peter Lessing—and at once.
