

THE OLD MAN AND HIS ASS.

By STEPHEN McSLOGAN. Once an old man in the country, With his little son, was driving An old Ass to town to sell him.

As they went, a fellow passing, Thus addressed the Ancient Farmer: "Friend, it seems a trifle stupid To be trading, faint and weary, With that little Boy beside you, Whilst your Ass goes on unburdened."

"Do you think so?" said the Farmer; And forthwith his Son he places On the Ass as snug as may be.

Pressing on, they met another. "Ah," said he, "you little rascal, Lazy, heartless little rascal, Don't you think you ought to be ashamed to ride your poor old Father Trading footsore, faint and weary?"

"Do you think so?" said the Old Man. Thereupon he bade his little Ass to mount and sit behind him. Thus these three went on together.

"Is that best four own?" enquired a Wayfarer in caustic accents. "Yes," replied the poor old victim. "No one ever would have thought so."

"Judging by the way you use him, You and that young lazy rascal Are more able far to carry That attenuated pack than I."

"Do you think so?" said the Farmer. Then, his boy and he dismounting, Tied the Ass's legs together. On a nickery pole they slung him, Each an end upon his shoulder. Thus they bore the Ass between them, Staggering 'neath the heavy burden; Till, arrived within the city, All the uttering population, Issuing forth from lane and dooryard, Clapped their hands and laugh'd and hooted At the singular proceeding.
