'Well, he might have discovered her and she has, perhaps, consented to fly with him!'

'What? and leave your honor?' exclaimed the malicious servant, who rejoiced at his master's discomfiture.

'She is young and inexperienced you know' Hans said.

'Oh, impossible — she would never be so foolish'

'Strange enough! The false hearted assurance of Carl afforded a deal of satisfaction to Hans.

'Perhaps you are right,' he said. 'We will return to the castle, and you can ascertain if she is returned.'

'I will.'

'And inform me at once of the result of your enquiries. I will meet you in the library.'

'Well.

And the Patroon and his servant returned to the castle, in search of the missing damsel.

Hans proceeded at once to his library, and Carl made his inquiries of the servants.

In his secret heart the cunning servant hoped that the conjecture of his master was correct, and that Viola had left the place with Bryan.

'The Blue Brotherhood will take care of her then,' he whispered. 'Ah, they are men.'

None of the servants, even Dinah, her maid, knew anything of Viola. They had not seen her since her departure.

'She has escaped!' thought Carl.

He went to the library

Hans eagerly admitted him.

'Well, Carl,' he asked, 'what of Viola?'

Carl shook his head.

'She is not here!'

'Where can she be?' asked Hans, in a tone of mingled vexation and rage.

'It is mysterious,' replied the servant.

Hans paced the floor for a few moments in great mental disorder. At last he turned to Carl

'You must ascertain where she is,' he said. 'Proceed through the whole settlement, and make diligent inquiry. If you succeed in finding her, you shall be rewarded!'

Carl departed

'If I do find her,' he muttered as he descended the stairs, 'may I be d—d!'

But he sauntered into the settlement, and after the lapse of an hour or more, he seated himself comfortably in the bar-room of Peter Schnapps, and called for a Tankard of rum.

'I will drink to our future success,' he said.

'Aye!' replied Peter, 'and do not forget the health of our friends, the Blue Brotherhood.'

'No! no!' said Carl

'How does it happen that you are so early astir this morning, Master Carl?' asked Peter.

Carl explained the object of his errand.

Peter was delighted.

'Oh,' he cried, clapping his hands, 'if she is gone off with the boy it will be the happiest incident I ever heard of!'

'Upon my soul, I believe it;' said Carl. 'At all events, she is not at the castle, and I hope she will be wise enough to avoid Hans Van Kempen for the future.'

'No doubt but she will!'

'He would not hesitate to make her wed him, or murder her,' continued the domestic; 'he has set his heart upon it!'

'I hope she will chide him.'

Carl sipped his rum with great gusto, and it was near noon before he returned to the castle.

Then he sought the library.

Hans was awaiting his arrival.

'What news?' he asked.

'I cannot find her!'

'Did you enquire thoroughly?'

'Of course I did.'

'Then she has eloped?'

'I fear that is the case!'

'All hope fled!' Hans cried. 'That will do, Carl, leave me now!'

And Carl left and went to the kitchen, for the purpose of satisfying his hunger.

Hans, as we have said, abandoned all hope.

'Curse on the minx!' he said. 'I was a fool for granting her the time I did fo consideration.'

In the midst of his reflections upon his losses, a servant entered the room and said that Fielding desired an interview.

'Show him up,' said Hans.

'My curse shall follow this man, who reared and sheltered the bantling that his parents disowned!'

Fielding entered the room.

'What is your business?' asked Hans, sternly.

'It will not detain you long,' said Fielding with his accustomed meekness. 'I come from Viola Fordham.'

Hans started.

'Go on

'She requested me to visit you, and return her thanks for your former hospitality — '

'Indeed!' interrupted Hans.

'And,' continued Fielding 'she desires you to send her her wardrobe in charge of her maid, and a sum of money sufficient for a year's sustenance.

Hans smothered his rage.

'Where is she?' he asked.

'At my house.'

'Ah! What are her intentions?'

'I do not know.'

'No deception, sir! I repeat my question!'

'And I my answer.'

'Does she intend to quit the country?'

'I believe she does.'

'For what region?'

'I cannot say.'

Hans was thoughtful.

'Tell her,' he said at length, 'that her request will be complied with to day.'

'I will.'

'I would immediately do so, but at present, and for a few hours to come, I am engaged busily.'

Fielding bowed and departed.

'Found!' exclaimed Hans, when he was alone. 'Nor yet am I entirely deserted by fortune!'

And he laughed.

'A chequered world! Light and shadow! Joy and grief, success and disappointment!'

And he paced the room.

'Of course I will send her the wardrobe, or, what is the same thing precisely, I will bring her to the wardrobe. It is only reversing the te ms, and she cannot complain.'

Poor Viola, relying upon the justice of her cause, and her personal privileges, she had placed herself again in the power of Hans, when every circumstance should have warned her to beware.

As soon as Hans could compose himself he sent for the captain of his soldiers.

When the man made his appearance, he said:

'Proceed with a file of men, at once, to the cottage of Fielding, the laborer, and arrest Viola Fordham.'

The man assented.

'Then,' continued Hans, 'bring her before me.'

The soldier departed upon his chivalrous errand.

'By the Gods,' cried Hans, 'this matter is not determined yet. I have still another chance.'

With the utmost impatience he awaited the return of the officer In the interim, he reflected, as well as his perturbed mind would admit, upon his line of conduct

Some clamor in the yard arrested his attention, and he moved quickly to the window.

The soldiers had returned.

Viola was with them.

In a few moments she was in her cousin's presence.

Hans ordered the departure of the soldiers

'Well, madame,' he said turning to the girl, 'will you be seated? Our business demands a conference.'

More from necessity, than a compliance with this cavalier request, she seated herself.

'We were interrupted last night.'

'Of course, you expected it.'

'I did not.'

'Do you mean to say that you knew nothing of the Blue Brotherhood, until their arrival?'

'I do.'

'Then you were sincere in your intentions towards me?'

'I was'

Hans was surprised.

'Then, you intended to wed me'

'I did'

'Dearest Viola!' he exclaimed passionately deceived by the manner and language of his cousin, and impelled by one of those sudden bursts of passion, not uncommon in men of his mental organization, 'I have most truly misjudged you, and for so doing I solicit your pardon. Accept this kiss as my earnest token of repentance

And he attempted to salute her.

Viola recoiled from him in horror.

'You mistake me, Hans Van Kempen,' she said. 'Let me explain. Last night I intended to do as I promised. I would have consented to our union, I meant no deception. Now the circumstances are changed——'

'And——,' interrupted Hans.

'Hear me,' continued Viola, with a gesture of impatience. 'Now the circumstances are changed Then I was compelled by the force of circumstances, and your bloodthirsty cruelty, and was not acting from my own free choice. Now you cannot fulfil your stipulations, made with me, and which was the consideration that moved me to accept your offer.

'How mean you?'

'You cannot restore Bryan Blonday to liberty'

'But he is free.'

'Aye, but not through your agency. You even left me in the chapel to hasten to his execution'

'Beware,' cried Hans, his rage again excited most fearfully. 'This is a contemptible subterfuge.'

'It is right'

'Do you refuse to wed me now?'

'I do.'

So intense was the passion of the Patroon, that for a few moments he could not speak a word. He glared upon the woman before him like a fiend, and seemed upon the point of seizing her.

Viola remained firm, but pale.

'You are resolved?' Hans asked.

'Firmly.'

'Then I will incarcerate you. You shall not again breathe the pure air of heaven, until you consent to be my own. I swear by the God above us, you shall never wed Bryan Blonday'

'Force cannot move me,' cried Viola. 'You have no control over my person, and dare not restrain my liberty.'

'We will see,' cried Hans, and he left the affrighted girl in the library, securing the door behind him.

He at once sought out the captain of the soldiery, and, after a long conference, returned with him to the library.
