

Agricultural Education Is Stressed By Speaker

The need of agricultural education was emphasized last night at Kensington by Dr. W. A. Jenkins, principal of the Nova Scotia Agricultural College at Truro, N.S. He spoke to an audience in the Kensington Regional High School. The meeting was arranged by the Community School group which is meeting there each week under the department of agriculture.

Dr. Jenkins told The Guardian in a brief interview that since he has taken over as principal at NSAC he has been emphasizing the courses at the college which provide the type of technical training that these young men who have a solid farm background, and a good formal training at an agricultural college, he said.

The college also has the degree course—two years lead to specialization in agricultural training and degrees of Bachelor of Science in Agriculture, BSA. This side of the training has not been neglected, but the college principal is laying the big emphasis now on building up at his school the training which is designed to help create better farmers and better farm technicians, both of which are greatly needed, he believes, in the agricultural industry which seemingly becomes more complicated with the passing years.

"If I talked for a time about educating young farm boys for employment off the farm, don't think I'm trying to encourage our young chaps to leave the farm," he explained.

"I firmly believe that we will require some of the keenest young men in the country to operate the farms of the future... we must make absolutely certain that our young men are properly and adequately trained for this important industry, and it will become increasingly important in future years, Dr. Jenkins emphasized.

Corn Production Sparks Interest

Interest in production of corn silage sparked in perhaps a dozen communities and involving 800 to 900 acres or even more, has been reported to The Guardian this week.

The largest single acreage production is that of Leo P. McIssac, Mermaid who plans on 100 acres of corn this year. But there are groups interested in such widely scattered communities as Point Prim, Orwell and Newton, Village Green, Earncliffe, Mt. Herbert, York and Suffolk, O'Leary, the Summer-side rural area, Baltic, Crapaud, Marshfield and Margate—for example, reports indicate.

Much of the new interest in this crop was sparked here last month when George Morris, Merlin, Ontario spoke to a large meeting of Beef Producers and others in Charlottetown. The immediate past president of the Ontario Beef Improvement Association made a tremendous pitch for corn silage. "It will produce twice as much beef per acre as any other known feed, he claimed, among other things.

It was Mr. McIssac, president of the P.E.I. beef producers who was responsible for bringing Mr. Morris here, but his own corn silage effort was started a year ago when he produced 35 acres of it, incidentally the several varieties grown produced an average of 18 tons per acre and came close to filling his 750-ton silo.

Mr. McIssac said that his planned 100 acres of corn for this coming season is designed to feed 300 head of feeder steers plus his 60 cows. The steers will be fed in his feed lot, the cows to be housed in the McIssac barn. He has had a large feed lot in operation through the winter and spring.

The Mermaid farmer said that the farmers interested in constructing silos are awaiting the decision of the government concerning financial assistance.

When the beef producers met here last month they talked with Agriculture Minister Macrae about the possibility of some form of financial assistance. Nova Scotia has been offering 20 per cent of the cost of silo construction up to a maximum of $500, they said at that time. Mr. MacRae suggested that in this province some financial aid might be made available on the ensiling, or the harvest machinery, either to a group of farmers working co-operatively, or to a man doing custom work for a group of farmers, The Guardian has been told.

This conversation took place following the evening dinner held in the Basilica Recreation Centre.
