HARD WORK FOR MORALE — they dodge their troubles instead of facing them. He celebrated his 90th birthday by driving round this Buckinghamshire village in his car.

The Unlatched Door

By Frank Price
CHAPTER SIXTEEN

Continued

Next there was the woman whom the inspector was convinced, Roy, if innocent himself, was shielding. Kenway had no doubt whom she would prove to be. If that conviction were correct, everything pointed to the girl who had been with the Wintertons that night who had remained behind when they left the Boldovins, whom Hemersley had taken home after her mysterious movements as described by the cloak-room attendant. How she could come into the business he had no idea. At present he knew no more of her than what the cloak-room woman had told him, and that she was visiting at the Wintertons. He intended to go to Streatham that afternoon, as much as anything in the hope of learning something definite with regard to her. At the moment he had no clue to motive in her case; as to opportunity, she might have gone to Darnley Mansions during the time in which she was absent from the cloak-room; but he had not a scrap of evidence that she did. He could only reserve judgment until he had seen her; in the meantime she must be included among the suspects.

Then there was Avicé Carlake. She was definitely among the possible and, with her he was strongly inclined to couple Anthony Revelstone and Samuel Lander; but he was forced to realize that unless he could get some absolutely direct evidence against them he would have extreme difficulty in fixing anything on them. They would swear anything, and though he knew that Revelstone and Avicé had already lied about their movements after leaving the restaurant, it would be hard to break down an alibi cleverly arranged and steadily persisted in by the three of them. Perhaps Saunders would have got some helpful information while shadowing Avicé last night. Then there was Milvers, the injured manservant; another piece which he could not see any way to fit into a place in the puzzle. Well, he would have his story to-day and with that, he hoped, much of the obscurity in which the case was enveloped would be cleared away. But he was not too hopeful. If Milvers knew anything of the murder and had received his injury about the time it happened, Kenway's theory that the shots coincided with the backfiring motor cycle would not hold water. It was not credible that the man had lain where he was found for three hours without being seen. Avicé Carlake and Revelstone asserted that the door of Borden's flat was shut when they came up. Their combined oaths were not worth a rotten apple but, supposing the worst about them—that they had killed Borden, been interrupted by Milvers and struck him down—would they have left him there like that? It wasn't a bit of good speculating about Milvers. He would have to tell his own story!

And now, on top of all these complications had come this queer business of the tenant who had not moved into Number 12! Of course, that might mean nothing at all; but it would have to be inquired into. He was glad that the coroner was willing to make the first sitting of the inquest, which was to be opened that afternoon, as brief and formal as possible. The only evidence given would be for identification, as to the finding of the body—and not too much of the last. There would be no mention of the two bullets at this stage. Kenway did not want the wielder of the pistol which killed Borden to be warned yet!

The first thing he did on arrival at the Yard was to phone the hospital. Milvers was better, but it would be best to give him as long as possible before questioning him. The house surgeon suggested three o'clock. That suited Kenway. The preliminaries of the inquest would be over by then and the fact that so important a witness had been unable to speak would be a cast-iron excuse for adjourning.

Next he rang up Martin Winterton and arranged to see him at his own house at 5 p. m. He gave as his request the desire to obtain information of the story told by Roy Hemersley and did not mention the lady visitor. He felt fairly confident that if she had any reason for being interested in the case, she would be in the house when he arrived.

Then he turned to his reports. That of Detective Saunders was interesting but not as helpful as he had hoped. He fully expected to hear that Avicé had met Revelstone or, possibly, Sammy Lander in order to acquaint them with the altered account of her movements on the night of the murder which she had given the inspector. Kenway had no idea who the man she did meet could be. Saunders had written a full account of their interview as he had seen it without being near enough to hear a word they said; he added a detailed description of the man with one inconic line of comment: "Looks like a White Slaver" and attached to his report was the menu he had picked up from the table at which they sat. The man's fingerprints would be on it, he said, and as it was only the dinner card and the restaurant had not been busy, it should be possible to pick them out. On leaving the restaurant, Avicé and her companion went to a dance hall, where they remained until nearly two, when they went to Darnley Mansions. The man left an hour later, the lights went out soon after, and there was nothing more to report.

to do so. If a wife wants her own home, and her husband is financially able to give it to her, he is falling down on his obligation as a husband in refusing to leave the parental hearth.

ANALYZE THE PROBLEM

Your problem is entirely different, but it will not be solved by the bitterness, which is so manifest in your letter. Instead of writing a blanket condemnation of the real estate industry, make an analysis of the field yourself. A little investigation will reveal that material and labor costs also have something to do with the situation—and these are as much a bane to real estate men as to you. Learn where to put the blame—then put it there.

Of course, you'll find close operators in any industry—but you'll also find plenty of honest builders and real estate men, as anxious to provide low-cost housing as you are to find it. Many communities are sponsoring projects to provide good housing at moderate cost—and I'm sure a progressive city like yours isn't lagging behind its larger sisters.

In your efforts to locate the housing you want, two things must be borne in mind. The skyrocketing costs of the aforementioned labor and materials have made it unlikely that the day of cheap housing will ever return to us. However, since thousands and thousands of other young couples have had to adjust themselves to what is available, you may have to, also. If you have been used to an old-fashioned private dwelling built of fine brick, plaster and wood, that you cannot expect to find in modern, new housing. The old substantial dwellings are gone—probably forever—but the substitute is not nearly so inadequate as you seem to believe.

Don't give up trying, rearrange your mental attitude a little, rouse your optimism, equip yourself with the real estate section of this paper, and best of luck to you!

DEAR MISS DIX: I am going with a boy who is very well mannered and behaves very well when he is with me. However, my girl friend says that when he is away from me he says mean things, and tells her he is going to stop seeing me.

DOLLY M.

ANSWER: Your co-called "girl friend" is a trouble-maker of the worst variety. Ignore her snide remarks, and wait until you have firsthand proof of the boy's duplicity.

DEAR MISS DIX: Although I am only 15½ and my boy friend is 17, we plan to be married soon. I want to give him an identification bracelet for his birthday. Would it be proper?

ALMA B.

ANSWER: The identification bracelet is too expensive a gift. I hope your folks prevail upon you to postpone your marriage for quite a while. At 15 you have no idea of the responsibilities involved and neither has the boy.

Miss Nissen cannot reply personally to readers but will answer problems of general interest through this column.
