ELLEN'S DIARY

The Robin's Song Echoed In The Morning Serenity

"Cheer up, cheer up, cheer up, cheerily!" Alex echoed the robin's song in the serenity of early morning, stepping a moment on the path which leads from the house across the lane, to eye the bird on a branch of the white birch tree above him — there where the rope swing hangs. "I wonder what he sings?" he smiled. "It's an I-love-you song" we said. "If you will listen you will hear a reply." "Yah, yah!" Mack grinned coming by. "That's for the birds strictly period." "Oh yes!" Alex queried teasingly. "It's the season for it you know. This is the time when a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love" we reminded Mack with a chuckle. "It was a fitting thought came, that among weekend visitors to Alderlea, there came a pair of strangers from a neighboring Province, two newlyweds: a pretty little dark-haired bride and her handsome young bridegroom. Married on Saturday morning, they had come to spend the honeymoon on the Island. Their holiday is well planned. Guests at a Motor Lodge they excursion just we two, and making lovely memories" she said, here and there Island-over. A-gyping in a manner, stopping where they will. He has been a visitor to the Island before, but for her this is the first trip. "I am so happy we planned it this way" she smiled. "And what, we wondered, did the future hold for them? A good life? A happy marriage? What makes the latter? To "bear and forbear" as a remembered Minister was wont to say? Andra Manrais the French

Novelist and Biographer has put it this way: "As a neglected garden is soon invaded by weeds, so a love carefully guarded is quickly submerged by making feelings. Everything threatens it: enmity, monotony, illness, the apicalness of third parties. Against these, I know of two remedies. The first is that which makes the very essence of marriage — the vow: "I will not give up; I will defend our union and happiness. I will tie up against every peril of the fallen wall." The second is sincerity without reserve. Mystery may be compatible with light and transient love. Marriage must live in confidence and certainty. Treachery has no power against two beings who confide all. Thus only is it possible to form an admirable affection, incomprehensible to friendship, of indulgence and respect, of indelicacy and admiration, an amazing blend of the human and divine, which constitutes the true marriage." "We'll come back because we shall always hold pleasant memories of the Island" they promised. "Nice youngsters" James said later. "But like everybody else, they'll find that getting married is the easy part of it, it's the "keeping house" that will count. But even that" he, the practical one, recalled is not the problem none was. And bless them! they have youth on their side." "And another day is "past and over." The May-month's footsteps echo now from the last bend of the way. Until tomorrow — Diary — Good-night
