CHAPTER XXI

"If you were the real Resident you couldn't get away with this!" Strang went on. "But as it is, I'll make an example of you in a way that'll fetch the tears to your eyes when you think of it! You're hot on trials aren't you? Well, you'll be the principal attraction at one to-morrow and perhaps your native pals won't be so happy when they see you tried up and flogged! I owe Teofora a good turn, and I can't pay him better than by letting him take the skin off your back, you lousy Beach-comber! And if it's any consolation to you, I've got the right to do it! I'm Acting Resident here now, and not even the Government would have a word to say against my punishing an imposter who's gone out of his way to attack me!"

He paused, and as Thurlow still made no reply, turned to the grinning Teofora who was standing beside him. "Take him into the storehouse!" he snapped. "Here's the key! Dump him on the floor there and lock the door, and then bring the key back here! You others carry him there!"

The two Samoans who had been standing one on either side of Thurlow, lifted him by the shoulders and heels, and carried him in the wake of the strutting Teofora out of the room and down the verandah steps. Their jerky movements jarred his aching head horribly, but the journey was a short one and when Teofora had unlocked the storehouse door, they carried him in and lowered him carefully on to the earth floor.

They were talking and laughing together in their own dialect, and Teofora, who had followed them in, peered down at Thurlow's upturned face in the gloom.

"Number one marster, you hey!" he jibed. "Plenty good fella; plenty strong fella, hey? Mebbe to-morrow day you not feel so good! And he bent down and spat full in the helpless man's face. A moment later the door slammed; Thurlow heard the click of the key in the padlock, and he was left alone in the pitch darkness.

He mechanically wiped his face on his jacket, and then lay back for some while absolutely motionless. He was still only half aware of what had happened to him, but gradually his brain cleared, and apart from the intolerable throbbing pain in his head he felt more himself again.

It was appallingly close and stuffy in the storehouse and presently he felt something run over his face. With an involuntary shudder of disgust that sent a sharp stab of agony through his ill-used skull, he raised his head and shook the creature off. It was one of the innumerable cockroaches which haunted the place, and with the realization that his prone position rendered him a prey to such

Blake-Horne Wedding

The marriage of Helen Elisabeth Horne, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John R. Horne of Charlottetown, P.E.I. and Maurice Vincent Fredrick Blake of Charlottetown, P.E.I., was solemnized in St. Paul's Church, Sackville, N.B., by Rev. J. Robinson Belyea, rector, on Saturday morning, June 20.

The bride was attended by her aunt, Miss Margaret MacLean, who also gave her in marriage. The groom's best man was Mr. W. D. Tinney of Charlottetown.

The couple left immediately on their bridal trip for various points in the U.S.A. On their return they will reside in Charlottetown.

loathsome visitations, he slowly and painfully began to work his way along the floor towards the long counter which ran lengthwise down the middle of the storehouse. He could see nothing, but he was aware of its approximate position, and he presently found it by knocking his head against it. Once here, he contrived to lever himself into a sitting position with his back against it.

By the time this was accomplished he was soaked with sweat, and he sat for a long while with his head sunk in pain that continued to pulse through his head. Little by little the full consciousness of his position was now coming home to him, and with it the realization of his appalling folly. What he had done was to ruin every hope that he might have had of establishing himself in moderate security on the island. Not for the first time he had allowed his infernal temper to get the better of him, and once again he was to pay bitterly for a moment of madness.

Admittedly the provocation had been great, but he told himself that a saner man would have paid no attention to Strang's bullying manner. After all, he had known at the time that the trader's position was not so strong as he evidently imagined it to be; and had he only kept that fact in mind and allowed it to emerge in due course, all might have been well with him. Nor was he to be the only sufferer. If Strang carried out his threats—and there was good reason to suppose he would—not only would he lose every scrap of prestige in the eyes of the natives, but also they themselves would be doomed indefinitely to the very ill which he had promised to alleviate. And M'Fian, too.

He groaned aloud at the thought of the ruin he had wrought by his insane impulse.

ing selfishness that isn't likely to disappear when they become husbands. Life must continue on their terms—or else! When a woman has been independent all her life is capable of earning a good salary, and accustomed to spending it as she pleases, marriage in the form of fettered slavery is not alluring. There are many things worse than loneliness, and a miserable married life is one of them. Though your present existence is not ideal, don't exchange it for one that will be intolerable. If the man doesn't care enough about you to continue seeing you, or to court you on conventional grounds, you are really better off without him.

DEAR MISS DIX: The boys in my class (high-school freshman) are all very nice and at one time or another I have tried to get almost all of them to be my boy friend, but no luck! I know I'm as pretty as the other girls, my figure is good, and I'm not overweight. Please help me. I'm desperate.

HOLLY C.

ANSWER: Trouble is, Holly, you're too desperate! The fact probably radiates from you and is more likely to scare boys away than all the things about which ads warn you. Do try to be a bit more subtle in your approach. The lesson isn't easy to learn at 13, but upon it depends your social future.

DEAR MISS DIX: I'm a girl of 17 with a sweetheart in the Navy. He says he writes to me every chance he gets, but can't mail the letters, sometimes for weeks. It's been two months since I heard from him now, and I wonder if he is really thinking of me and writing.

B.V.

ANSWER: Uncle Sam keeps his boys pretty busy, and their girl friends must excuse them if they can't devote as much time to letter-writing as the young ladies would like. The middle of the ocean is sadly devoid of mail boxes, and, since you admit that you do receive mail in bunches from your sailor, I see no reason why you should doubt his word about writing. Girls who select servicemen for sweethearts need more patience and understanding than the girls who have their boy friends at home; instead, you seem to have less patience and practically no faith. Either improve your moral and emotional stamina, or get a beau who is more available.

routine. It is an excellent period in which to plan new ventures and to take trusted friends into your confidence if you cannot put your ideas into action alone. Do not discuss projects with strangers, however.

During the afternoon and evening hours take time out to work at a hobby or any other recreational activity that will keep both mind and hands active. Emotional stress should be avoided at all costs. Plans for travel are favored now and social activities should prove stimulating.

For the Birthday
If Monday is your birthday, be prepared for a period of stimulating experiences, especially where romance and travel are concerned. You are entering a new social phase and are on the verge of making many new friends.

Home and family matters should prosper this year and by late fall you should note a steady improvement in both financial and professional affairs. Make plans now for the immediate future and be prepared to take advantage of unusual opportunities that will be offered soon.

A child born on this day will be gracious, intelligent and endowed with great poise.
