U. N. Committee Deadlocked On The Question Of Algeria

By LLOYD McDONALD
Canadian Press Staff Writer

UNITED NATIONS, N.Y. (CP) A deadlocked political committee gave up Friday night on the question of Algeira and threw the issue to the United Nations General Assembly without submitting any proposal.

The debate came to an end after an unprecedented tie vote on an Afro-Asian resolution amended by proposals by Canada, Ireland and Norway.

The tie vote was ruled by committee chairman Djalal Abdoh of Iran as rejection of the motion. Another resolution put forward by seven Latin countries was withdrawn, and despite efforts by Tunisia to have the original Afro-Asian resolution voted on, the debate was ruled concluded.

Prospects are that the whole procedure will have to be repeated in the assembly next week. It is understood Canada is hopeful of putting through her amendment in the assembly. It is certain too that the African-Asian group who have championed the cause of the Algerian nationalists against France will endeavor to pass their original call for a settlement there.

The Latin group also is reported reserving the right to keep its own proposal alive, indicating a hectic if repetitious debate for the assembly's closing days.

The committee chairman gave his ruling following a recess called when the tie threw the situation into confusion.

Advanced Engineering New Cars Poses Service Problem

By DAVID J. WILKIE

DETROIT (AP) — Design and engineering advances in the newest - model automobiles have brought new servicing problems as well as convenience and comfort to the motorist.

Some of the servicing operations have to be handled by experts trained at the factories.

They would present more than the usual problems to the self-employed mechanic or the do-it-yourself enthusiast.

Wholly new to automobile repair shop workers is the servicing of fuel injectors, air suspension systems and air levelizers. And for some filling station shops the new "X" frames present lift problems for grease and oil jobs and under-the-car repairs.

REQUIRES TRAINING

Servicing fuel injectors is a technical problem. It requires requires training and knowledge of their design. To that extent the problem is complex only where there is a lack of such knowledge.

Somewhat different is the handling of the air suspension and air levelizing units. They operate automatically. Any shifting of weight brings the levelizer into action.

The auto makers introducing air suspension generally are issuing directions for safe handling of the units in the repair shop. They caution against turning on ignition or opening any doors when the car is on a hoist or when any wheel is off the ground. Either of these actions will put the levelizer into action.

They also recommend that the battery ground strap be disconnected to prevent leveling action when the car is being towed with front or rear wheels off the ground.

DIFFERENT SYSTEMS

The service workers also are cautioned against raising the rear end of a car with rear shock absorbers disconnected. This, they are told, could result in a separation of the rear air-spring assemblies and other possible damage to the system.

The systems are not all alike. In some instances a switch may be tripped to lock out the automatic leveling feature. But in many instances even the car owner is not entirely familiar with its operation.

The hazards involved in servicing newly-developed equipment are thoroughly explained in the owners' manuals that go with new cars. The car makers are urging new car buyers to read these manuals immediately upon getting delivery.

Many car buyers never open the guide books until trouble develops.

Problems Seen In Switch To Professional Armed Service

By KEN METHERAL
Canadian Press Staff Writer

LONDON (CP) — The British government, committed to ending national service by 1962, may find manpower problems much more perplexing in the next few years than deciding how best to keep up in the international race for satellites, more powerful nuclear weapons and longer-ranged and more accurate guided missiles.

The planned switch to a pattern of all - professional armed services means that in the next five years the three services, particularly the army, must attract an additional 30,000 or more volunteers each year. On the present showing, the prospects are not to hopeful.

Senior defence officials admit they are "disappointed" by the lack of response to reeruiting drives. Even the Navy, already close to all-regular status, is feeling the pinch. One enterprising officer has promised a week's leave to every sailor bringing in a recruit.

COST BIG FACTOR

The crux of the problem is money.

Since 1950, Britain has concentrated on developing a big array of new weapons. Cut off from developed her own atomic and hydrogn bombs plus a V-bomber strategic air force to carry them. Some of her tactical nuclear weapons and short-range missiles are considered superior to anything yet produced by the United States.

Such projects have boggled up a substantial portion of the defence budget, which this year totals some £1,500,000,000, leaving little for provision of new barracks and married quarters, better uniforms and other recruit-attracting amenities.

Indications are that the government now intends to trat amenities as a matter of urgency, but it is questionable whether the country's economic position will allow a broad - based improvement program to proceed with sufficient speed to overcome the present apathy. A long-promised pay increase is expected to be delayed for some months.

EYE CANADIAN UNIFORM

However, a decision is expected by next spring on a new army uniform. The war office is understood to be paying close attention to reports that British soldiers describe the Canadian uniform as "the last word in how to equip a soldier for his work."

Besides heralding the end of national service, the defence white paper presented to the Commons last April announced plans for cutting the armed services to some 375,000 men — the present level is 650,000. It put the emphasis on highly-trained mobile forces equipped with the most modern weapons with the overriding principle being prevention of war through deterrent weapons.

The Army's present strength is about 335,000 all ranks, but only one-fifth of this number can be classified as regulars. The war office estimates that more than 22,000 regulars must be recruited annually for the next five years to reach the target of 160,000 men in 1962. The Army is establishing a highly-mobile reserve in Britain that can be airlifted to reinforce the relatively small forces to be retained in Germany and the Middle and Far East.

Hardest hit by the changes are 36 of Britain's most famous regiments, now being merged into 18 units. It means the disappearance of cap badges, traditional hallmark of each regiment's spirit of individuality, known in England for more than 100 years.

The Navy, present strength about 100,000 all ranks, is cutting down to its 1962 target strength of 75,000. The main naval elements will be based on a small number of carrier groups, each composed of one aircraft carrier and a number of supporting ships. The last battleships have been scrapped and even large cruisers will eventually be replaced by smaller warships, some equipped with guided missiles.

The Royal Air Force, present strength 215,000, is being reduced to about 140,000. It will be equipped with pure - jet Comets and long - range Britannias to transport the Army's mobile reserve Britain also is developing a "stand-off" bomb — a powered guided bomb that can be launched from a conventional bomber hundreds of miles from the target.

The manpower targets plus the decision to close down the huge naval dockyard at Hong Kong, leaving Singapore as the last major British bastion in the Far East, indicate the manner in which Britain is slashing defence expenditures.

Ironically, naval cuts come at a time when many observers are suggesting the country should channel her major defence effort into the naval service, especially the submarine fleet.

Their argument is that Russia's startling advances in the field of intermediate and intercontinental ballistic missiles make the American and British strategic bomber bases in Britain particularly susceptible to surprise attack. They suggest that the time is fast approaching when it may not be possible to protect even missile bases on such a narrow stretch of land as the United Kingdom.

Instead, they suggest there is a strong case for building up a fleet of atomic-powered submarines for use as missile launchers.

Subs Can Cruise Under Pole Ice

NEW YORK (AP) — Rear-Admiral H. G. Rickover said Thursday nuclear submarines could cruise under the ice of the North Pole to get quickly between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans.

Rickover is head of the U.S. Navy's scientific team which developed the atomic submarine and now is working on nuclear powered surface ships.

Rickover said that the recent feat of the submarine Nautilus in travelling 1,383 miles under the Arctic ice "is not fully appreciated."

Rickover said a power failure in the Nautilus' gyro compass was the only reason why the submarine did not reach the Pole itself.
