Dorothy Dix Says

The first of these is lack of comfort at home. When I say comfort I mean not only good food and a clean and orderly house but a peaceful and pleasant place in which to live. Most men are under a strain which their wives do not comprehend and with which they do not sympathize. They do not realize that when a man comes home tired and hungry after a hard day's work what he wants more than anything else on earth is just sheer physical comfort. Loving hands to draw him across the threshold. Cheerful smiles. A good dinner. Quiet and rest.

Millions of women literally drive their husbands away from home by cooking and their nagging and complaining. They haven't sense enough to know that the best way to keep a man tied to his own fireside is to fill him so full of good food and make his easy-chair so soft that he will not want to move from it. There is no other such cure for a roaming foot as house slippers.

THEY ARE BORED

The second thing that starts husbands to petticoat-chasing is boredom. Very few wives consider it any part of their duty to be entertaining and amusing companions to their husbands, and the result is that most evenings at home are as dull as dishwater. Husbands and wives sit up in a silence that you could cut with a knife, or else they enliven it with quarrels, or wife tells him all the bad news she can think of.

It is to get away from the prevailing domestic gloom that makes many a man jab his hat on as soon as dinner is over and go to the movies or his club, or to step out with ladies who will clink him up and make him laugh.

And the third way and the commonest way of all in which women lose their husbands is by their refusal to flatter them and jolly them along. Most wives feel it their sacred duty to tell their husbands of their faults and to generally deflate their ego. Never was there a more dangerous pastime, for every time a wife sticks a pin in her husband's little pink balloon she sends him out to some other woman who doesn't criticize his grammar, or look tired when he tries to tell a story, but who tells him how big and great and wonderful he is.

For every man must have some woman before whom to pose and strut and to whom he can boast as he cannot to a man, and if his wife won't give him the glad hand there is always some lady around the corner who will.

After all, if a woman doesn't want to lose her husband, she has to take as much care to keep him as she does to keep a pearl necklace.
