

A Printer and His Hens.

(New York Dispatch) We have a printer in this office who has gone into the chicken business for all it is worth. We will call him "Slug Two." "Slug Two" was led to this step by the awful price of eggs. He ordered a dozen from a country dealer, figuring that each hen would lay an egg a day. This would be seven dozen a week, which, at the present market price, would be $1.25. As their keeping would cost but twenty-five cents a week, it would require little figuring to show that "Slug Two" would be the gainer of $1.50 each week that he kept these hens. The chickens were promptly delivered. The first day he did not expect the hens to do anything, as it would take them a day to get used to their new quarters. But the second day he put on a "sub" and stayed at home to gather eggs. Early in the morning the chickens commenced crowing. He straightway repaired to the house.

"My dear," said he to his wife, "do hens crow?" "Why certainly," said she, "but when they do, it is a sign of bad luck."

He watched all day, but there was no increase in the egg output. The second day resulted the same, when he consulted a German lady.

"Hens won't lay in the winter season unless they are kept in a warm place," said the oracle.

Then he brought in a couple of the chickens and put them in a baking oven. Their sufferings were very soon over.

"I believe there is something in the saying that a crowing hen brings bad luck," muttered "Slug Two." Then he was advised to buy them some grain and feed them oats; to feed them meat, and he bought porter house steak and chopped it up for them. But not a single egg could be got. Worn out, disgusted, and about $5 out of pocket, he was about to kill the hens and get the eggs, when he had no doubt they were carrying around with pure perversity, when his wife advised him to sell them.

He brought around an intending purchaser yesterday, who no sooner looked at them than he commenced laughing.

"What's the matter?" asked "Slug Two." "Have I got them too fat?"

"Mein Gott, no," roared his neighbor, "but dem hens are all roosters."

It was too true. "Slug Two" had been lavishing all the time, labor and a good deal of meat on male specimens of the feathered tribe. He says the next time he goes into the poultry business he'll buy a hog.

The Indian Question.

(Detroit Free Press) A tall and commanding-looking Indian from the Canada side, having a big back load of door mats on his back, was tramping up Randolph St., yesterday, when a man in a saloon beckoned him in. The red man's face lighted up with a "ten-cent-piece" smile of satisfaction as he walked in. There were three men present, and they seemed to be in a hilarious state.

"See here, old copper-face," said one, as he shut and locked the door, "I'm down on Injuns, first, last and all the time. They shot an uncle of mine, and I've sworn revenge. Maybe you are ready to take the all-fired licking you ever got?"

"Hu!" replied the Indian, as he looked from one to the other.

"And the infernal vermin scalped and roasted my grandmother!" put in the second white man. "I didn't care particularly about the old lady, but its the principle of the thing I look at, I've got to have Injun blood!"

"Hu!" said the Indian, as he seemed to catch on.

"And I," put in the third man, "am down on Injuns in a general way. After these other two fellows have got through with you I propose to walk on the mangled remains. Let the performance now begin!"

It began. People who looked in at the window could see nothing. People who got a look through the open door, saw hats, door-mats, sawdust and chairs hovering in the air, but not for long. In about three minutes the red man stalked forth, somewhat flustered and little bit wayworn, but he had not lost a drop of blood nor a door-mat.

Inside the saloon all was peaceful and serene. The man whose uncle was shot was lying under a table; the one whose grandmother was shot seemed trying awful hard to remember how the affair began, and the one who went in general principles was looking out of two black eyes at a ruined nose.

"Hu!" called the Indian, as he was ready to move on.

But no one heeded.

Miss Elizabeth Milne, teacher of the Douglas Cottage School at Linlithgow, Scotland, was evicted from her house the other day, and her bedridden mother, 86 years of age, was removed from her bed and placed on an easy chair on the wayside. She lay there for two hours and then expired. This is one of the most barbarous cases of eviction on record.

The house of an old colored man, familiarly known as Uncle Dan Mud, near Yorktown, Va., was struck by lightning the latter part of last week, and himself, his wife and child killed. It was several days before the facts became known.
